Homecoming: It's not the same

By Mark L. Curelop
Collegian Staff

Look through some old UMass INDEXs and you'll find a lost era; of smiling homecoming Queens in miniskirts or saddle shoes, a parade followed by a bonfire, pre-game picnics and post-game dances, and alumni rediscovering their college days. Ask the alumni this weekend and they'll tell you Homecoming was the biggest event of the year..

It's not 1950 anymore, though this weekend, sponsored by the UMass Interfraternity Council and Panhellenic Council will feature similar activities. Alumni will be returning, after 20 years or two, to watch the football game and to see old friends.

Homecoming, as we now know it, is primarily a function of the Greek area. The reason is attributed "that more Greeks return to campus because the men and women have a home to return to," said Corrine Campbell, Panhellenic Council President. "If you lived in a dorm, the odds of you returning for a visit to see the concrete walls are less likely than if you lived in a house where you know that you did something for your house," she said.

Homecoming, the time when alumni return to their Alma Mater was replaced in the 1930's by Amherst Weekend.

Graduates of the Massachusetts State College (now the University of Massachusetts), Amherst College, and Smith College returned to the Pioneer Valley to take part in the events of the area. Dances were held Friday night at the respective colleges, after a bonfire was held on campus.

Saturday featured the traditional football game, the victory usually going to Massachustts State College. More dances followed, as did parties at the fraternities and sororities.

The ceremony and excitement returned in the 1950's and continued well into the late 1960's. UMass held parades often with fifty floats from the Greek area and dormitories combined.

The route often started at Curry Hicks parking lot, or in front of Whitemore Administration Building, and continued down Lincoln Ave. to Amity Street where the route was directed east onto North Pleasant St., and went back to campus for judging the floats.

A rally was held in front of the Student Union Building or the campus pond by the students and alumni while the Friday ended with partiers at fraternities and sororities. In 1963 however, the bonfire never took place due to the six-week drought in the area.

Saturday was the day that people swarmed the football fields. A tailgate picnic, an event when the tailgate of a station wagon was placed down and used to display the picnic items, was held near the fields by the alumni and their families before the game.

The Umass Marching Band put on a special show for their guests.

Themes such as "The Arabian Nights", the UMass Centenial" in 1962, to name a few, were displayed in a way that everyone from six to sixty would be entertained.

Saturday evening was spent in Curry Hicks Cage listening to the music of Dionne Warwick, The Blues Magoos, the Animals, Donovan, Buffy St. Marie (a UMass graduate), David Frye, and Traffic. Fraternity and sorority parties followed as did a dance the Student Union Ballroom.

The weekend ended on a peaceful Sunday, hearing the tunes of Boston Pops conducted by the late Arthur Fiedler, Stan Getz, or the Dave Brubeck Band.

Homecoming 1979 will be different from the events of yesteryear. The dormitories have not entered a float, as every dorm once did, nor is each fraternity and sorority.

WELCOME ALUMNI!

Gridders to face Rams of URI

By DAN GUIDERA
Collegian Staff

Hoping to secure a firmer hold on their first place spot in the Yankee Conference nabbed from Boston University last week, the UMass gridders host the Rams of the University of Rhode Island for Saturday's homecoming game.

The first place Minutemen currently are ranked fourth in the NCAA Division 1-AA, while URI, 1 and 4 on the season, is third in the Yankee Conference by virtue of a 10-0 whitewashing of the lowly Maine Brown Bears two weeks ago. The Rams did not play last week.

The URI attack is led by junior tailback Leroy Shaw, the school's second all-time leading rusher. Shaw's 360 yards (aided by a 135-yard performance against Maine) place him in the fourth in Yankee Conference rushing. He averages 3.6 yards per carry.

The Rams are quarterbacked by sophomore Greg Meyer, who did not start the Maine game. Meyer has thrown ten interceptions this season, and has completed only 36 percent of his passes.

The offensive unit of URI has put 50 points on the score board, while the defense has allowed 117 points. The Rams defense has allowed an average of 315 yards per game, with 239 yards per game on the passing game. The Minutemen have gained over 200 rushing yards the past two weeks against both North Carolina Central and Boston University.

Last year the Minutemen downed URI 19-17 holding off an amazing URI comeback. Down 19-3 late in the fourth quarter, the Rams battled back to make it 19-17 and attempted a two-point conversion to tie the score. Steve LeMay knocked away Steve Tosches' pass and rescued the UMass victory.

In last year's homecoming game, the Minutemen, behind the solid rushing attack led by Hank Serrault and Dennis Dent along with McEvilly run for a touchdown, defeated UConn 17-10.

This Saturday is Mike McEvilly Day in honor of the senior quarterback. At halftime, McEvilly will be honored by the residents of his hometown of Clinton.

Last Saturday the Minutemen moved into first place in the Yankee Conference with a 20-6 win over the previously unbeaten Terriers of Boston University. The UMass gridders received a super effort from both offensive and defensive lines and came up with the big play when needed.

McEvilly completed 10 of 13 passes for 122 yards and set up both UMass touchdowns. McEvilly is currently ranked second in the Ynakee Conference behind Jim Jensen of BU.

Tailback Cliff Pedrow turned in another solid effort racking up 87 yards on the ground to put him in fifth in YanCon rushing. Pedrow was awarded the game ball.

Sandro Vittiello's two field goals placed him third in Yankee Conference scoring.

After the URI game, the Minutemen travel to Storrs to play the University of Connecticut. The Minutemen will have an off-day on November 3, and will return to action November 10 when they host the Crusaders of Holy Cross on the last game of the season to be played at Alumni Stadium.

New fund

The Band Scholarship Fund was established by band members of the Class of 1965 in order to make available financial awards for outstanding and needy band members. Subsequently, scholarship funds were established in memory of Francis Kennedy, UMass graduate and founder of the Band Alumni Association; and Nelson Jaegar, for many years a devoted friend of band members. Over the years, these funds have been used to provide modest awards to band members who have encountered emergency financial circumstances.

This year a challenge donation by Ernest Patrikas, Class of 1965 and former University Band Manager, has made possible the First Annual Band Scholarship Award by the Band Alumni Association. The recipient is recommended by a committee representing the University Bands' students, alumni, faculty, and staff. This year's award will be presented by Band Alumni President Kathleen Dwyer Jones during Homecoming Pregame Ceremonies in Alumni Stadium on Saturday.

Parade begins near Whitmore

By DIANE CLEHANE
Collegian Staff

Homecoming Weekend festivities sponsored by two Greek area councils begin tonight at 6:30, with the traditional parade starting at Hagais Mall continuing through Amherst Center and back to campus for a bonfire.

The parade will include floats made by members of UMass sororities and fraternities. Pledges (perspective members) will offer entertainment at the parade by dressing up and cheering on their floats while some of the pledges will also be collecting for UNICEF.

This year's parade will be held earlier than last year's in the hopes that more community members will be able to become involved, Panhellenic activities Chairwoman Sarah Roll said. She commented on the change calling it "a great idea...This year we have 88 community groups involved in the homecoming parade and the weekend. We have been coordinating with the local shops and they have been very cooperative. We want all of the community not just the Greek area to get involved in Homecoming."

Friday night's events at the University also include a bonfire at the Campsu Pond and a free multiband concert. During the rest of the evening most of the Greek houses will welcome back their alumni with parties for members and invited guests.

A Saturday brunch at most houses for members is scheduled before the traditional football game. While the game is said to be the highlight of the weekend for most, many people in the UMass Greek system said they feel the weekend is a good opportunity for them to get together not only within their houses but within the entire Greek Area as well. Roll, a member of Sigam Delta Tau, said, "It is the best time for all of the Greek Area to get together

Maria Fiffi steps back to observe her artistic ability as she and other members of Sigma Delta Tau put some finishing touches on a banner for the float which will be in the "Homecoming" parade today at 6:30. The other members helping on the float, which is being made in combination with Delta Epsilon, are Sarah Roll, Cindy Zalkind, Mary Bradshaw, and Barbie Callahan. (Staff photo by Paul Price)

Ten bands perform tonight

By JIM LENNOX
Collegian Staff

Tonight at 8:15 the Fine Arts Center Concert Hall will resound to a performance by ten University musical groups as part of the Homecoming weekend festivities.

More than a concert, director John A. Jenkins calls it, "a real show, with a wide variety of entertainment, from jazz to dance to percussion to the entire Minuteman Marching Band."

The fifth annual Multiband Concert is sponsored by the Music Department as part of Homecoming weekend. It is open to all and the admission is free.

The entire evening is tied in closely with the Homecoming weekend festivities, thanks to a tremendous organizing effort, according to Jenkins, on the part of the Homecoming Committee. The Homecoming Parade will march to the Bonfire, then the Minuteman Marching Band will lead the crowd over to the concert hall. The awards for the float competition will be announced outside the FAC at approximately 8:10.

Multibands' presentation is entitled "Family Fun at Multiband Pops" and promises something for everyone. A tremendous variety of musical groups are featured from the vary professional jazz workshop to the very informal faculty/staff group, the Oompah Band.

Jenkins, who has previewed the show, had high praise for the University Dancers. Six members of the troupe perform a piece called "to Be Danced While Jogging Around the Yorktown Track and Sung with Pam on the Sidescreen Porch." Choreographed by Andrea Watkins, Jenkins describes the dance as "Pure, concentrated joy."

"It's funny and a real audience pleaser," he said. "It's a real showpiece for the dancers."

Jenkins, who is a Fine Arts Center Faculty member, also directs the Concert Jazz Ensemble, which will perform a piece called "Kalimba" by Bob James.

"It's a very difficult piece," he said. "It's very difficult for the ensemble to play it in time."

Jenkins said the Concert Jazz Ensemble will also perform "Tank" by Gordon Goodwin, "Mountain Music" by Bob Mintzer, and "Cheerful Me" by Andrew Lloyd Webber. Jenkins said Webber is among the selections they are performing along with a classic Mangione's "Legend of the Sun Goddess" and "Sailor."

As James MacRoche of the Fine Arts Center put it, "Anyone who comes is bound to have a good time."

1 in G Minor. The ensemble is 83 members strong and Chesnut recommends people get seats toward the middle for a 22 piece brass section surprise.

The Brass Choir offers an up-tempo rendition of Alfred Reed's Symphony for Brass and Percussion with a strong double percussion section.

A contemporary performance by the University Jazz Workshop will showcase "Cheerful Me" a swing piece and "Shoreline Drive," a more down to earth number.

More unusual is the performance of the Afro-American Vocal Jazz Ensemble, interested in a variety of musical forms from gospel to an "upside down" music. The ensemble will perform "Ain't Nobody Here But Us Chickens," "Mountain Music" and "Cheerful Me" by Andrew Lloyd Webber, Duke Ellington's "Caravan" and Williams Dwight Lazz's "Bluesette." Jazz is among the selections they are performing along with a classic Mangione's "Legend of the Sun Goddess" and "Sailor."

Ensemble and the UMass Marimbas, who are the only N.E. marimba band, have been asked to play at the National Music Educators COnference (MENC) in Florida.

Fourteen different percussions instruments, pitched and unpitched, are featured by the UMass Percussion Ensemble. Directed by Peter Tanner, they will perform the oriental sounding "Swords of Meda-Ling" by the American percussionist Gordon Peters.

A definite high point should be the faculty staff group, the Compah Band. A very informal group, the band performs German oompah music. Here they are a very good-time Bavarian band. The ensemble will perform "Ein Prosit" by Alois Wunderlich, "Mountain Music" and "Cheerful Me" by Andrew Lloyd Webber.

As James MacRoche of the Fine Arts Center put it, "Anyone who comes is bound to have a good time."

FAC charges for babies too

By ROSALYN REISER
Collegian Staff

Should parents pay an extra $8 to bring their infant along to a Fine Arts Center concert? Even if the child is too small to sit in a seat by him/herself?

Yes, said Barbara Aldrich, acting manager of the Fine Arts Center, in a recent interview. The FAC's policy is "that any child, regardless of age, must have a ticket—even babes in arms."

For many mothers, especially single mothers on low incomes, this policy seems unusually harsh. Patricia Sullivan, a single mother and part-time UMass student, said "I want to expose my daughter to music, not worry about where she is—and I have no money for a babysitter anyway."

When Sullivan bought FAC series tickets two years ago, she explained to the ticket salesperson she would be bringing her daughter and wanted an aisle seat in case she got "fussy." The ticket salesperson did not tell her she had to purchase a ticket for her daughter, said Sullivan.

Every time she brought her daughter to a concert, however, she was "hassled at the door" by ushers who told her she must have a ticket for the infant. The box office employees said "you should leave her at home," said Sullivan. This continued even after Allen Light, then the FAC manager, made an exception for her and said she did not have to have an extra ticket, agreeing that "it was ridiculous" to have a ticket for a 20-lb. infant who would be held in her mother's arms anyway.

Sullivan said Light told her he would notify the ushers, but, she said, the harassment did not stop. She said she was especially upset because the ticket office gave no refunds so she was forced to either pay an extra $8 for her daughter or forfeit her own $8 ticket and leave.

Speaking for the FAC management, Barbara Aldrich supported the policy: "We feel that the money spent on a ticket for the child would be better spent on a babysitter."

But Sullivan said she doesn't have money to pay for an extra ticket every time she brings her daughter. Since women are often the ones who have responsibility for child care, she feels the policy discriminates against women—poor women in particular. "The wealthy have money for a babysitter," she said. "I think it's an elitist, sexist policy."

Janet Wojciechowski, mother of an infant and a 7-year-old, said that she was looking forward to taking her family to the upcoming "Babes in Toyland." "I certainly don't mind paying for my 7-year-old, she said. "But I don't think I can afford tickets for my son, husband, baby and myself—and my baby's going to be in a carrier on my back."

Sullivan said she would not mind paying a reduced price for her daughter at concerts, when she's old enough to sit in a seat—but now, at 35 lbs., the seat still "buckles under her."

Wojciechowski said she thought it was unfair that "If you don't have money, you can't expose kids to the arts." Jeanine Maland, UMass student and mother of one child, agreed. "It's a state school—we're paying for that building," she said. Maland also said "there are a growing number of single women in the area" (Sullivan said there are 1,000 single mothers on campus), and that "a lot of those women do not have an alternative for a babysitter."

Aldrich argued that as a non-profit organization the FAC needs the money from ticket sales to meet expenses and performance costs—and said, "I cannot make exceptions or I'd be making exceptions for everyone who wanted something excepted." She said the policy has been in effect since the center opened five years ago and "Frankly, I don't intend to change it."

Greeks plan annual Las Vegas night

The 18th annual Las Vegas Night mock gambling casino will be sponsored by Alpha Phi Omega, the National Service Fraternity, tomorrow at 7:30 p.m. on the first floor of the Campus Center.

"Money" won at the gambling tables can be used to bid on a number of items at the "auction", which will be held at 11 p.m. These items have been donated by numerous businesses in the area. Last year a frisbee sold for $35,000.00

The crowning of the unofficial Homecoming Queen, who is the winner of the Royalty Contest, will occur at 10 p.m.. Voting, in the form of 1 cent = 1 vote, is taking place this week in the Campus Center Concourse and at Las Vegas Night itself in the Campus Center Auditorium until 9:30 p.m. tomorrow.

Art historian lectures on work celebrating women

Diane Gelon, an art historian, will lecture on Thursday, Oct. 25 in room 227, Herter Hall at 8 p.m. on the "Dinner Party Project," a work celebrating women throughout Wester history, which was created by author Judy Chicago.

The lecture will include a comprehensive look at the Dinner Party exhibit, its significance as a work of art, the historical research as well as the feminist environment of the studio. A slide show will accompany the lecture and a discussion and reception will follow.

Jewish women's week begins with brunch

"In Celebration of Jewish Women," ten days of events exploring the heritage of Jewish women, will begin on Sunday Oct. 21 with two programs. At 11 am, a brunch and discussion will take place on "The Changing Myths & Realities of Jewish Women in the U.S."

Speaking will be Nancy Geltzeiler, Director of Student Activities at Boston University Hillel. Fee is $1.50 for brunch only in the Commonwealth Room, SU.

At 7 pm, the film "Yudie," a biographical documentary of an elderly woman living in New York City, will be shown. This will be followed by a discussion on "Growing Old as a Jewish Woman" with Marian Greenberg, long-time activist, and others.

Arts Club sponsors coffeehouse, concert tonight

A benefit concert/coffeehouse tonight will feature Massachusetts-based songer-songwriter Tom Abdow. Sponsored by the UMass Arts Club, the concert will be in the Fine Arts Center, room 431.

Other performers will be guitar, mandolin and fiddle player Tracy Scott; UMass students Lee Piscioneri and Judith Fagerson; and Joseph, whose musical style is "whatever to berequired for the situation," according to an Arts Club press release quoting him.

Artists appear at gallery to discuss their exhibits

Artists of two new exhibits opening at the Herter Gallery on Oct. 21 will be presented there to discuss their work. The exhibits, "Contemporary American Landscapes in Glass," by Robin Brailsford and Eric Hopkins and, "Just the Two of Us," by Mary Shaffer are environmental-related pieces in glass. The exhibits will run until Nov. 2.

Mount Holyoke begins auditions for Simon play

Auditions for Neil Simon's comedy "The Good Doctor" will be held at Mount Holyoke College's Alice Withington Rooke Laboratory Theatre Oct. 20 and 21 at 2 p.m., and Oct. 22 at 7:30 p.m.

"The Good Doctor," based on short stories by Anton Chekhov, will be directed by Jim Cavanaugh and presented Dec 6-12 at the Laboratory Theatre..

Auditions are open to the public. For further information, call: 538-2118.

Prof to play jazz pieces on radio program tonight

As part of the weekly program, "Jazz Alive," on WFCR-FM, 88.5 on the radio dial, UMass professor and percussionist Max Roach will perform tonight at 11:30.

"Jazz Alive" is a Five-College program.

"Measure for Measure" by Shakespeare at AC

Shakespeare's "Measure for Measure," will be presented at Amherst College's Kirby Memorial Theatre tonight, tomorrow, and Oct. 21, 26-28 at 8. Seating is by reservation only. Box office hours are 10-5 weekdays. Tiskets are $2.50 and free for Amherst College students with identification.

Also tonight through Oct. 21 and Oct. 23 through Oct. 25 at 8, the play "She Stoops to Conquer," will be produced at Mount Holyoke College.

Panel to talk economics, depression, current goldrush

A panel discussion titled "Fifty Years After the Great Crash—What Next?" will be presented by the Economics Department Monday, Oct. 22 at 7:30 in Mahar Auditorium. The topics will include the causes of the Great Crash, the current gold rush, energy and inflation, and the potential for mass unemployment.

Also discussed will be the upcoming presidential campaign.

Netwomen down Jeffs but lose to UConn

By DAVE SIVRET
Collegian Staff

After winning both of their matches last week and pushing their season's record over .500 for the first time this year the women's tennis team went out and won a scrimmage against Amherst but lost a regular match versus UConn. The loss dropped their season's mark to 4 and 4.

Against Amherst the netwomen showed great adaptability by playing very well on clay, a surface they had not played on all year. "We turned in another good all around effort and I was really pleased to see how well we played on clay, it often throws a team to play on this much slower surface without any practice," stated a pleased coach John Beal.

Winners for the Minutewomen were Sally Fryberger, Lee Robb, Captain Joanne Vennochi, and Cris Carson in the singles and in the doubes it was a sweep for UMass with Carolyn Tarbell and Beth Noble, Fran Troy and Beth Goldberg, and Liz Case and Jane Carson all handily defeating their opponents.

The rivalry between UMass and Amherst has always been a keen one but this year it is especially strong because of the presence of two former UMass players who transfered to Amherst and are now playing for the Lady Jeffs.

In the match versus UConn it was simply a case of the better team playing well when they had to. The match was tied at three-apiece with two individual matches in the third and deciding set. The women from UConn rose to the occasion by winning all the remaining matches and taking the team match 6 to 3. "On the whole we didn't play too poorly, they are one of the better teams around and they showed it by winning when they had to," said coach Beal.

The winners for the Minutewomen were #1 singles player Sally Fryberger (6-4, 7-6), Captain Joanne Vennochi (6-3, 7-5), and Barbara Mills (6-2, 6-2).

The next match for the netwomen is today at home against highly ranked Boston University. They have one of the deepest, most talented teams around and a victory over them would be a major accomplishment for the women from UMass.

Booters host URI Rams

By MIKE ESTRADA
Collegian Staff

Golden opportunities don't come often in life. Even in sports anything more than everyday glories are few and far between. But, every season has the big game and for the UMass Minutemen the day is today when they face the University of Rhode Island, 10th rank nationally on Boyden Field at 3:00.

On tap is something more than a display of some of the best soccer in New England. The Rams have had a bit of trouble with their northern swing, losing to Harvard Wednesday, tainting their previous record of 7-1. If URI is vulnerable, the Minutemen (4-2-2, unbeaten at home) have a chance to earn the resect of New England.

On paper the Rams are awesome with wins over St. Louis, UCLA and UConn. Besides the upset by Harvard, URI's only loss came against San Francisco, the defending national champion. The number one ranked team in New England is also the proud possessor of All-American candidate Len Mercurio. With 15 goals in nine games, Mercurio has been named the Yankee Conference offensive player of the week and is the area's leading scorer.

As for the Minutemen, well, they have nothing to lose and everything to gain. After two away-game losses to UNH and Boston University, UMass edged Providence Wednesday on a Wayne Moran goal that was one of the best you'll ever see.

UMass coach Russ Kidd has had his back to the wall for a week as far as NCAA tournament hopes are concerned. But a loss against top-ranked URI shouldn't produce teams. No matter what the overall consequences, that moment should have come during their two losses last week.

Home field advantage is more than a casual term to the Minutemen. In three games at Boyden Field, UMass goalie Mark Marilla has not allowed a single goal. Credit the defense, allowing less than ten shots per game.

BOOTER BANTER: Senior Wayne Moran, with his goal Wednesday continues to be the teams leading scorer with six, just ahead of Tony M. Dias with four. The Minutemen have their Alumni game Saturday morning at 10:45 before taking a week off in preparation for tough UConn.

Oarwomen head East

By JAY BRIGHTMAN
Collegian Staff

This weekend the women's crew team travels to Boston for Sunday's Head-of-The-Charles Regatta. The three-mile race starts in front of the B.U. campus and ends adjacent to Memorial Drive. This race originated 15 years ago with the sanction of the National Association of Amateur Oarsmen, the financial support of the Boston Globe, and the dauntless effort of the Cambridge Boat Club. The race became an instant success and attracts crews from all over the country.

"Last year we placed 23rd out of 40 boats in the women's four and I'm confident that we will do better this year," said Coach K.C. Dietz. "The women's eight should finish in the top fifteen of the field."

Last weekend, in their first race, the women's varsity eight finished fourth in a field of twelve in the National Invitational Women's Regatta which was held at Brunelle's Marina in South Hadley.

The women work extremely hard to get into top form. Their training consists of running, weight-lifting, and working out in their boats every day under all weather conditions. These women are truly devoted to the crew and deserve support this weekend at the Head-of-The-Charles Regatta.

Read centers offense

By SCOTT SOLOMON
Collegian Staff

Junior center Fred Read is currently in his first year on the UMass varsity football team. To get there he had to battle his way up, competing with both junior varsity and varsity players. He even had to change positions in order to fit into the varsity program. But, for the Rhode Island native, it was worth the climb.

"The mental transition was tremendous," said Read. "Physically I was used to it because the junior varsity acts as a 'look' team for the varsity, so I'd be hitting these guys all week."

In the preseason prior to his sophomore year, Read, playing at offensive guard for his first two seasons on the junior varsity, was invited to the varsity camp, and asked to work out as a center. While he continued playing J.V. ball, Read switched over to offensive center.

"I was really depressed in the beginning," Read admitted, "the whole year was basically a learning experience. What helped me prepare was going live against the varsity. The big difference was that the varsity practices are more intense than the junior varsity practices. In addition, there is a lot more hitting when you have varsity guys going against varsity guys."

There were quite a few mental hurdles for Read to overcome while striving to reach varsity status, and his major influences came from the other players.

"All the players helped me," he said. UMass quarterback Mike McEvilly tried to tell me not to get down. They told me to keep pushing forward, keep my head up and things would work out, which they did. As a team," he added, "we get closer and closer as the season goes on."

For Read, now in his junior year, making the varsity was something that had been in the back of his mind since coming to UMass in 1977.

"When you're going out for football," said Read, "you have to go in with the idea that some day you're going to end up on varsity. You should never go in with a negative attitude, or even unsure of yourself. What counts most is that you give it your best shot."

After a couple of varsity games, Read felt that he had finally found the groove that he had been working so hard for, leading the offense in front of McEvilly.

"I think I've handled it pretty well so far," he said. "But as Coach Pickett says, you always have to strive to do better."

Fred Read began his football career at Lasalle Academy High School in West Greenwick, Rhode Island. When he started, he had a slight advantage over most of his teamates.

"I've been interested in football since I was a kid," said the 22-year-old Read. "My older brother was at Lasalle at the time I started, so things worked out quite well."

Read had many positive things to say after observing the UMass football system, and participating in the program first hand. "They (the coaches) know where they're going. They have their goals and ideas set right out."

As a team, Read feels that UMass has all the potential, but likes to look at it from a more reserved standpoint.

"We have a solid team," said the 5'11" 232-pound center. "We just go at it week by week, game by game. My own goal is to go out there and do the best that I can, and I know that things will take their course. This year it was said that there would be a lot of competition in the league," Read added. "But we have to meet it head on, and we should be able to handle it."

Aside from the preparatory aspects of the game, Read explained what it was like on the field.

"When you're on the field, your concentrating on the play, the count, everything. You don't even hear the fans," he added with a laugh. "It's like they don't exist."

Tomorrow afternoon, Read and the rest of the Minutemen will face the University of Rhode Island at Alumni Stadium at 1:30 p.m.

"It's a big game for me," said Read, "because I have two brothers that go to U.R.I. That's one I really want to win."

After all the hard work that Fred Read has put into the UMass program, he has earned his spot on the varsity squad, and a chance to show his hometown what he's learned.

Alumni invasion

For those of you who don't know it yet, this is homecoming weekend. All day Saturday and Sunday, alumnis will be invading the campus. They will be everywhere, hundreds of them, thousands of em, maybe millions of them.

Hopefully, a large number of the alums will take in the football game Saturday against URI. If so, one of them will inevitably get into a friendly conversation with a friendly UMass student on the current state of affairs in UMass athletics.

On one side of this conversation is your average UMass alum, who graduated lets say four years ago, and is still far too busy looking for a job to keep on top of things at his alma-mater. On the side is your average run of the mill UMass student, lets make him a sophomore (sophomores never get any ink). This earthshaking conversation may sound something like this:

ALUM: Hey man, these Alumni franks really such you know that!

SOPH: Yeah, no shit! This one tastes almost as good as the wrapper it came in! By the way, my name is Orville, I'm a sophomore. Do you go to UMass?

ALUM: No man, I'm an alum, class of 75, names Wilbur, nice to meet you. Nice game today huh? The Minutemen look sharp. Terrific crowd too. Say, you guys must have had a huge crowd for BU last week, boy what a game.

SOPH: Yeah, it was unbelievable, there must have been 11,000 there, and boy were they noisy.

ALUM: Eleven thousand? For BU? We used to get that many for Northeastern, and those were UMass teams that lost to BC 70-3. The Minutemen are really exciting this year. Why doesn't anybody show up to see them?

SOPH: People around here have far more important things to take care of on Saturday afternoons, like doing their laundry, playing that Lenny-size pinball machine in the Campus Center or going to the new mall to buy posters. They don't have the time for football.

ALUM: Oh Well, I guess this always was and always will be a basketball school. By the way how did the Lea-men do last season anyway?

SOPH: The basketball team? Boy they really sucked! They went like 5-20 or something. The seniors were really lousy. Mt. Greylock State could have blown them out. Games at the Cage were about as exciting as my philosophy lectures.

ALUM: The Cage? You mean to tell me they still paly games in that old barn. That thing should have been nuked years ago!

SOPH: (In a low tone) Quiet man. Never say nukes around here, you never know what's going to happen. These people will protest at the drop of a hat.

ALUM: That's right, I'm sorry, I forgot. This is no-nuke capital of the world. But I thought they would certainly have replaced the Cage by now.

SOPH: Well, they were going to be a dome over this thing, but nobody's said anything about it for a while.

ALUM: Put a dome on this thing? Hey that's pretty funny. You're a very clever person. Really, what were they going to do?

SOPH: I'm telling you man, they were going to put a roof on the stadium and use it for everything from football to Benb concerts.

ALUM: Hey, I guess that would be pretty good. You could get 20,000 in here for basketball, and the hockey team would finally get its own rink.

SOPH: That would be great. Only problem is we don't have a hockey team anymore!

ALUM: No hockey team! What the hell happened?

SOPH: Well, the team went 1-20 or something like that last year, so the administration bagged it.

ALUM: Why would they do something like that? A school this size without a hockey team is ridiculous!

SOPH: It was either that or pump money into the program heaven forbid they should do that, or drop them down to Division 18 or something, where they could play Faber College and the Connecticut School of Broadcasting.

ALUM: Wow! Things have really gotten pretty bad around here. So far I have heard nothing but bad news about the athletic program up here.

SOPH: Bad news? That was the good news! Wait till you hear the bad news...

Harriers face field of 6 in Yancon tournament

By JANE WOLFSON
Collegian Staff

Tomorrow the UMass mens cross country team travels to the University of Rhode Island to take on six other teams in the Yankee Conference Championships.

Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Connecticut, Rhode Island, and Boston University are the other schools participating in the meet. UMass is the defending champion, and have continually won the event for the past nine years.

This year however, the Minutemen's main competition will be coming from BU. BU has already defeated Harvard and Northeastern, teams that beat UMass. And, in addition, they lost to cross-country powerhouse Providence College by only one point.

"BU has been cast the favorite to win," said harrier Coach Ken O'Brien. "UNH will also be tough. If BU runs their top runners they should win," said New Hampshire coach John Copeland. "UMass looks like the second strongest team, depth will be the strong factor," he said. "But UMass has the depth to win."

Running for UMass will be captain Rick Walls, sophomore Paul Beaulieu, juniors Kevin Molteni, Mike Doiron, Paul Kirksy, Bob Martin, and senior Steve MacDougall.

"BU will be the team to beat," said Beaulieu. "We have to run well this weekend to keep up our moral," he said. "From our practices this week we'll run our best race of the season."

Runners to watch for tomorrow will be BU's John Wilson, Mark Kimball, Joe Kelly, and Terry Drost. Along with UNH's Gary Crossan, Guy Stearns, Dean Kimball, Kevin Haddock, and Peter Foley.

Going into Saturday's meet the harriers have a 2-3 record, having defeated Boston College and URI and losing to Harvard, Providence College and Northeastern. The harriers also placed fourth out of eight teams, in the Eastern Athletic Association meet held at Rutgers University.

After this meet the harriers will travel to Penn State Invitational, this meet was designed to replace the ICAs which UMass will not compete in because they are no longer in the ECAC.

Library bricks may be safe afterall

By BRIAN O'CONNELL
Collegian Staff

Bricks from the 28-story University Library may not be in danger of falling after all, according to officials from the state's Bureau of Building and Construction.

The BBC could recommend in six to eight weeks that the library be re-opened, officials said.

BBC Director Stuart D. Lesser said Friday that although a report they had was "very, very preliminary," the possibility of huge sections of bricks falling off the library facade "doesn't appear to be a possibility at this moment."

Lesser is not recommending to the UMass adminstration that they re-open the library until authorities "are absolutely certain" that the building is safe. He said all studies will be completed in six to eight weeks.

According to Lesser, it was originally thought defective bolts in the angle irons on the tower could not support the weight of the bricks, "but now, this may not be the problem." Tests on the library "will continue," he said.

Three firms are currently conducting investigations of the library—Simpson, Guntertz and Hager of Cambridge, Thomas and Lichtner of Brookline and LeMessurier Associates of Cambridge. Authorities from the BBC said that LeMessurier will no longer be in charge of the study because the firm was involved in construction of the UMass/Boston library, which also is plagued by falling bricks.

UMass Chancellor Henry Koffler closed the library last August 31, just days before classes were scheduled to begin, after a report completed by Loomis and Loomis, Inc. of Windsor Connecticut said there was danger of bricks falling off the building in an earth tremor, sonic boom or violent weather. Loomis and Loomis also investigated the design of the Hartford Civic Center roof, which collapsed last winter, just hours after a UMass/UConn basketball game.

The UMass library was completed in 1973 at a cost of $16.5 million by the Holyoke construction firm of Daniel O'Connell and Sons. O'Connell & Son's are no strangers to campus construction problems, as they are the same firm that built the leaking Campus Center Garage—also the subject of close investigation.

Meanwhile, students have been using Goodell Hall as a make-shift undergraduate library. Physical Plant workers constructed a ramp for the handicapped yesterday.

Workers are also placing bales of hay on the courtyard surrounding the University Library to cushion the possible impact of falling bricks over an underground accessway. Officials say they are considering opening the library to graduate students.

Carter, Kennedy share stage at J.F.K. library dedication

By JIM MORAN
Collegian Staff

President Jimmy Carter and Senator Edward M. Kennedy shared the stage Saturday before an invited audience of 7,000 people at the dedication ceremony for the opening of the John Fitgerald Kennedy Library at the UMass Columbia Point campus.

It was the first time the two have appeared publicly since it became known they might be opponents in the race for the Democratic nomination for President of the United States.

Carter, in his remarks, referred directly to that political speculation. Using an anecdote about the late President, Carter told of how, at a 1962 press conference, a reporter informed President Kennedy that his brother Edward remarked he would not want to be Chief Executive.

Carter continued, "Then the reporter asked President Kennedy two questions: One—if he had to do it over again would he run for President? and Two—would he recommend the job to anyone else. And President Kennedy responded, "The answer to the first question is yes. The answer to the second question is no, not for awhile." Looking over at Senator Kennedy, Carter deadpanned, "It's nice to know that the wit and wisdom of President Kennedy has as much relevance today as it had nearly 20 years ago." The audience burst into laughter.

Setting politics aside, Carter spoke of the martyred president and his legacy, describing the ceremony as "at once so solemn and joyous."

Then came Senator Kennedy. He called the ceremony a "happy rendezvous with history." "We are here today to honor Jack, and through honoring him and his commitments, we honor ourselves," Kennedy said solemnly. He thanked the University of Massachusetts and the community of Dorchester for "welcoming us as friends and neighbors."

The ceremony lasted about two hours, and included a host of dignitaries from the Kennedy and Johnson administrations, as well as several local civil and political leaders. On the platform, the lineup included Jacqueline Kennedy Onassis, the late President's widow, his two children, Caroline and John Jr., Senator Kennedy and his wife Joan, U.S. House Speaker Thomas P. "Tip" O'Neill, former Speaker John W. McCormack, Lady Bird Johnson, Boston Mayor Kevin H. White, Senator Paul Tsongas, Humberto Cardinal Medeiros, the Archbishop of Boston, Ethel Kennedy, wife of the late Senator Robert Kennedy, and her son Joseph P. Kennedy, III, and the President and Mrs. Carter, among others. Master of ceremonies was Stephen Smith, director of the Kennedy Library Corporation and brother-in-law of Senator Edward Kennedy.

As part of the ceremony, the late President's children, John and Caroline, read a poem, with John handing the keys to the library over to President Carter to declare it "open forever to the public." Rose Kennedy, matriarch of the family, was not in attendance.

The library, designed by architect I.M. Pei, looks over the skyline of Boston and the Boston Harbor. It has been described as a "period piece" commemorating the lives and works of people of the mid-Twentieth century; such notables as Ernest Hemingway, Martin Luther King, Arthur Schlesinger and Robert Kennedy. The library and museum contain many historical documents, audio and visual resources, and artifacts.

Inside the museum, after the ceremony, Ehtel Kennedy watched a film about her husband Robert's presidential campaign in 1968. She stood there with her children, shoes kicked off, laughing at the happy moments, listening to his words, and at the end she wept openly.

A few moments later, in higher spirits, she said something to a Kennedy Library worker which indicated the immence of another Kennedy candidacy, and the usual family involvement such an effort implies. "I have a feeling you may be seeing a lot of me in the near future, maybe more than you'd really like," she said.

World honors DuBois in site dedication ceremony

By KAREN THOMAS
Collegian Staff

"DuBois would be suprised at the integrated school system in the South, as the liberal North manages to still stay segregated," said Georgia state Sen. Julian Bond.

Bond was keynote speaker Saturday at the National Historic Landmark Dedication of the William Edward Burghardt DuBois childhood homesite in the Tanglewood Concert Theatre in Lenox. The UMass University Library contains the papers of DuBois.

The late Dr. W.E.B. DuBois contributed much to civil rights worldwide. he was co-founder of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, and he helped to draft the Nigara Resolutions, which included "the right to work and the chance to rise." He founded the first Pan Afrikan Congress in Paris 1919 and went to the People's Republic in China where he spoke at a rally with Mao Tse-Tung.

DuBois was recognized worldwide at the dedication. The ambassador to the United States from Ghana, Dr. Alex Quaison-Sackey, said of DuBois: "He spent all his life fighting against injustice and today he is finally being honored at home."

DuBois was born in 1863 in Great Barrington. Before his death in 1963, DuBois became a citizen of Ghana and was a personal friend of Quaison-Sackey.

Also present was the Counsellor Xie Qime, from the embassy of the People's Republic of China, representing the ambassador. Qime read a letter from the ambassador who said, "DuBois gained outstanding academic achievement and his great friendship for the Chinese will live with the Chineses people forever."

DuBois attended Harvard University in 1885. He was the first black man to receive a Ph.D. there. According to an anecdote Bond stated, DuBois said "That was Harvard's honor, not mine."

DuBois' stepson, David Graham DuBois, said Saturday his father's legacy must not die. He said the legacy consists of "dignity, commitment and militancy. It must be passed on and protected against those who would destroy and distort it."

The stepson pledged that he will do his utmost in assuming the responsibility of carrying the DuBois name and he appealed to others to "join with me and all of those who have assumed responsibility for this task in any way. This will asure that the DuBois legacy lives."

Maragret Bush Wilson, Chair of the NAACP Board of Directors, said that DuBois was a "prophet without honor in his own country." DuBois was editor of Crisis

Troops fire on Thai marketplace

KHOK SUNG, Thailand(AP)– Mortar crews firing from inside Cambodia pounded a Thai village marketplace with a barrage of 20 shells yesterday, killing four persons and wounding seven others. The attack, blamed on Vietnamese troops, heightened tensions between Thailand and Vietnam.

It was the second such mortar attack against Thai territory in a week.

The open market in this town 120 miles east of Bangkok is used by Cambodians who cross the border to buy black market items from Thai traders. One of the dead was a Cambodian, and the others were Thais.

The area was cleared after the shelling. But the Thai army did not retaliate.

Republicans push tax cut bill

WASHINGTON(AP)– Republicans on the Senate Finance Committee are launching a new effort to coax Congress into passing a tax cut this year, despite the objections of the Carter administration.

The committee, on a 10-10 tie vote last week, rejected a GOP plan to block the Social Security tax increase due to go into effect for workers and their employers in 1981.

Sen. William V. Roth, R-Del., chief author of that plan, will renew the effort this week. Aides say he is not sure whether he will try to win one more Democrat for the $11-billion Social Security tax cut or try to pass a $30-billion reduction in income taxes.

Greens seek delay in court fight

HASTINGS, Neb.(AP)– Gerald and Diana Green, having buried their 3-year-old son, Chad, in a Nebraska cemetery, sought yesterday to get more time in their legal battle over the cancer treatment he received.

The Greens' lawyer, William L. Ginsburg, said Mrs. Green wants to talk to Gov. Charles Thone to win more time to spend with relatives here before seeking asylum in California from a Massachusetts court.

Ginsburg said he doubted Thone would consider extending an earlier verbal agreement to allow the Greens to stay in their native state for three or four days.

ACLU appeals execution

CARSON CITY, Nev.(AP)– The American Civil Liberties Union failed yesterday in one phase of a last-minute appeal to the U.S. Supreme Court to stop the execution early todayof confessed killer Jesse Bishop, an ACLU spokesman said.

Henry Schwarzschild said Justice William Rehnquist in Washington had rejected the ACLU's plea for a stay of execution. He said the petition could be brought before other justices for consideration. The Supreme Court previously had rejected appeals for Bishop twice this month, the latest on a 7-1 vote Friday.

Congregation held hostage for 'fed-up' vet's broadcast

By BRYNA BRENNAN
Associated Press

ST. ALBANS, W.Va. – A man armed with a rifle burst into a small church yesterday and held 27 worshippers hostage for two and a half hours before surrendering after reading an obscenity-ridden statement over the radio, authorities said.

The gunman, who identified himself as a "fed-up" Vietnam veteran, gave himself up after he was allowed to broadcast a statement from the church over Charleston radio station WCHS. No one was injured.

The man, identified by state police as Harold Mann, 31, was arraigned before Magistrate Carl Withrow and charged with kidnapping. He was ordered held without bond. Kanawha County prosecutor James Roark said Mann was taken to Charleston Area Medical Center for a psychiatric examination.

Police said the gunman lived next to the church. Mann described himself as a Vietnam veteran who was "fed up with the goddamn government."

Mann entered the St. Albans Church of Christ about 10:45 a.m., while the congregation was singing a hymn and demanded to talk to reporters, witnesses said.

"He busted through the doors while we were singing. He started screaming and cussing," said Carey White, a member of the congregation.

About 45 people were in the church when Mann entered the building. He allowed about 15 people, including some children, to leave and ordered the others to remain.

Several reporters and paramedics came to the scene and entered the church. Mann was then allowed to make a statement on the air from inside the church.

In his brief obscenity-filled statement, Mann said he was "fed up with the federal government."

He complained of constant headaches that he said required him to take narcotics.

Mann accused the federal government of favoring "draft dodgers and deserters" in hiring people. He also accused the government of bringing "gooks" into the country, keeping Americans out of work.

He said he was determined to "save kids" from future wars. He said wars are waged to make profits for large corporations.

Police officers and firefighters from throughout the area had ringed the church. The state police called in its SWAT team, and sharpshooters had been positioned on a small front porch of the church and near windows along the sides of the church.

News tips hint adults plan walkout

Associate Press

BOSTON – Tips to news organizations before school walkouts will be part of a police investigation into allegations of an adult conspiracy to get youths to leave classes and demonstrate on streets.

The walkouts and demonstrations led to days of racial violence, linked to court-ordered busing to integrate public schools, last week.

"When the news media starts to get tipped off well in advance of an event, we begin to wonder just how spontaneous it is," Police Superintendent John Doyle said Saturday.

"It's happened more than once or twice in recent days."

Doyle would not say which newspapers or television and radio stations received the tips, but the Boston Globe reported yesterday that a WEEI radio reporter received an anonymous phone call informing him of a walkout last week well before it happened.

Doyle was picked by Police Commissioner Joseph M. Jordan to head an investigation into recent racial violence, school walkouts and marches to City Hall.

Jordan said on Friday he had begun "a full investigation into the planning of these walkouts.

"There is a strong indication that these incidents have been orchestrated by adults," he said. Jordan also said the trouble amounted to "hooliganism," not protest.

Beginning today, police also will try to prevent students from walking out of schools and marching in the streets, Jordan said The probe is expected to get underway today.

Parade celebrates Homecoming

By MARK L. CURELOP
Collegian Staff

Under grey skies, Homecoming weekend was kicked off by the Interfraternity and Panhellenic Council's "A Review of the 70's" parade Friday night that began in front of the Whitmore Administration building.

The UMass Marching Band, followed by five floats entered by UMass sororities and fraternities and one entered by the faculty/staff Oompah Band marched down Lincoln Ave. to Amity St., then proceeded down North Pleasant Street, through the center of town, and ended at the Fine Arts Center.

Bill Atkins, Chairman of the Amherst Board of Selectmen, Ruth Green of the UMass Vice Chancellor's Office, Louis Hayward, Town Manager, and Marjorie Lenn of UMass Residential Life, judged the floats on the criteria of suitability of theme to the 70's, quality of construction, originality, and overall presentation.

Sorority Sigma Delta Tau and fraternity Delta Upsilon received the Best Overall float trophy for their theme presentation of the "Year of the Child" featuring Kermit the Frog. Sorority Kappa Kappa Gamma and fraternity Pi Kappa Alpha won the overall runner up, and sorority Alpha Chi Omega and fraternity Phi Sigma Kappa won the Most Original Theme award for their float on the UMass gas shortage.

The band marched to the bonfire near the Campus Center Pond where about 300 people cheered a short speech by football co-captain, Michael McEvilly.

The fifth annual Multiband Concert was held in the Fine Arts Center Auditorium following the bonfire.

The fraternities and sororities held brunches and tailgate parties for their members and alumni Saturday prior to the UMass University of Rhode Island football game.

Immediately following the UMass victory, happy hours preceeded dinners for alumni and fraternity sorority membrs at their respective houses, followed by parties and exchanges in the Greek Area.

Alpha Phi Omega, the National Service Fraternity on campus, sponsored Casino Night on the ground floor of the Campus Center Saturday night. The money raised at this event will be donated to various charities, a spokesperson said.

"Homecoming is a time for the Greek Area to get to know those who live in the area," said Sarah Roll, panhellenic activities chairperson. "The Greek Area is working towards a 1950's Homecoming, each year adding a little more to the ground work," she said.

Crowds rally in Manhattan in protest of porn violence

By JOAN McKENZIE
Collegian Staff

An estimated crowd of more than 5,000 feminists, college students, lesbians, and community activists rallied in a march against pornography Saturday in New York City.

Women from across the country assembled at Columbus Circle in Manhattan to protest violent images of women displayed throughout the media in magazines, advertising, films, and on album covers.

Approximately 200 students from the Five College area attended the march. Two buses left from the campus center at 8:30 a.m. with about 140 students, and a bus left from Northampton with about 60 students from Smith and Hampshire Colleges. Both male and female students attended. The buses arrived in New York City at 12:30 p.m.

Students from the Five College area lined up at the corner of 62nd street and Central Park West. Two students from the University of Massachusetts, Denise Kendell and Kyle Hoffman, led the five college representatives holding a banner reading "Women of Western Mass."

Leading the march and carrying a banner reading, "Women Against Pornography. Stop Violence Against Women." were well-known feminist personalities Gloria Steinem, Bella Abzug and Susan Brownmiller.

Chanting "2-4-6-8, pornography is women hate" and "No more profits off our bodies," the demonstrators proceeded down Broadway and 42nd street past pornography shops and movie theaters. The marchers carried signs reading "Pornography is the theory, rape is the practice," and "Pornography is rape on Paper."

The rally began at 2 p.m. with a song sung by jazz singer Janet Lawson, who was followed by speakers from the feminist movement.

Amina Abdur-Rahman, director of education for the New York Urban League, said, "Black women live in double jeopardy. They're women and they're black. Porn merchants defamed and libeled all of us.

"The only way to deal with this," she said, "is to come and combat all of them together." Rahman spoke of the failure to see pornography as a political issue. "If they were hanging blacks and jews on 42nd street they would see it was political. Well they are hanging blacks and jews on 42nd street -- black women and jewish women."

Robin Morgan, author, poet and contributing editor of Ms. Magazine said, "Violence against women is now acceptable; it is chic. The message is violence against women is normal and we're supposed to buy that message." In regard to the timing of the march, Morgan said, "You're damn right it's time. It's past time."

Susan Brownmiller, author of "Against our Will: Men, Women and Rape" said, "If an evil is not challenged it will continue to grow. A trip to the corner newsstand turns into a humiliating experience." She spoke of the common image of a woman being bound and gagged. "We will not be stopped. We will not be gagged. We are going to howl in our rage," she said.

Former Congresswoman Bella Abzug said, "We object to the overtake of a society by violence. We do not see images of women fighting to get jobs, or fighting for dignity, but women being raped." She said, "The surest way to weaken our rights under the First Amendment is to say there is no way to combat this horror show."

Gloria Steinem, founder and editor of Ms. Magazine, directed her comments at those who say pornography is protected under the first amendment. "This rally is a victory for the first amendment. We are here to exercise our freedom of speech," Steinem said women have the right to represent themselves as they truly are, not as men perceive them.

"This is no longer acceptable. We will remove the mask of normality and intimacy. We will attack both and tolerate neither. More than half of all rapists are in fact trying out violence that is illustrated, instructed, and legitimized in pornography," she said.

The rally ended with a speech by author and feminist activist Andrea Dworkin. In an impassioned speech, Dworkin said, "There is one message and that message is, 'She wants it.' The belief is that the female wants to be hurt. The victim of rape is asked 'Did you like it?, did you want it?' " Dworkin says this is the message pornography relays.

Candlelight vigil starts abortion rights week

By DEBBIE WALLACE
Collegian Staff

Abortion Rights Action Week, called by organizers a nationwide effort to advocate women's reproductive freedom, commenced locally with a candlelight vigil in Northampton's Pulaski Park, last night.

About 75 participants, mostly young white women, along with men and children lined Main Street in front of the park wearing signs advocating reproductive freedom. Nancy Felton, a member of the Western Mass. Abortion Action Coalition, an organizing group, said, "We are here to mourn the loss of lives of women who were killed from illegal abortions. The vigil form is used nationally to affirm the principle of the separation of church and state. Everyone should have the right to choose for themselves."

Smith college sophmore religion major Peri Hall said, "The anti-abortion movement takes away womens' rights to control their own bodies."

The UMass Socialist Feminist Collective, is sponsoring Reproductive Rights Action Week Oct. 20 to 27. Members said they view the issue of reproductive rights in a much broader context than abortion rights. Collective member Kim Christensen said, "Reproductive rights also includes fighting against sterilization abuse, fighting against violence against women, and fighting for lesbian/gay rights."

Christensen said, "Family issues and issues of sexuality are really important to people. They are issues that bring out strong emotions." She said certain anti-abortion groups are being funded by the church and corporate interests in an effort to strengthen the nuclear family and manipulate people's sentiment.

Coalition member Virginia Duquet monitored an information table which held petitions for supporters to sign. She said one of the petitions will be taken Friday to State Rep. Silvio Conte's office in Holyoke as a culmination of the week's events. Vigil leaders maintained that Conte consistently voted against pro-abortion legislation.

Duquet said, "Another important issue is medicaid funding for abortions which is being cut. This forces poor and third-world women to be sterilized."

Other supporters included Hal Fales, an adolescent therapist and Northampton resident. He said, "I support the right of women

'And Justice For All' fails to confront the issue

Movie makes corruption comic

By DEBBIE WALLACE
Collegian Staff

Al Pacino's latest film, the highly publicized And Justice For All, which depicts corruption in the United States' criminal justice system, could have had major significance but unfortunately misses the mark.

And Justice For All fails because it is comical; making light of a serious issue. It also has too many stereotypes to be realistic.

Pacino plays Arthur Kirkland, a young crusading criminal attorney who is out to protect the rights of his clients against the constant abuse he sees, yet his caseload is mostly the worst offender.

One is a neurotic transvestite crook who should have been granted probation -- but a substitute lawyer did not read Pacino's notes at the hearing. This is a cheap shot because it is Pacino's colleague who causes the fluke, and that cannot really be considered a miscarriage of justice.

But one defendant who really is a victim of the justice system is a youth imprisoned for a traffic ticket then framed for the murder of an inmate. The youth's prison sentence is extended by a ruthless, unsympathetic and dishonest judge. Played convincingly by John Forsythe, the judge is a deceitful character, yet this and other scenes do not investigate the actual causes of criminal justice.

Not only is the humor in And Justice For All overplayed, but director and co-producer Norman Jewison continually spells out the meaning of the film, leaving viewers little opportunity to think on their own.

The few good scenes when Pacino communicates with the defendants do not make the movie.

Yet, the acting in the film is noteworthy. Jack Warden, for instance, expertly plays a compassionate but suicidal judge.

The basic problem with And Justice For All is a trite script which fails. Kirkland's relationship with a beautiful lady lawyer, for example, sems very cliche.

Advertising for this film is grossly exaggerated. Yet considering such horrifying exposes as a Time magazine's summer cover story on a few indecent judges, it seems And Justice For All's focus on unworthy judges is appropriate. But the film is slanted and ignores positive aspects such as recent successful moves in prison rehabilitation.

'Measure for Measure' true humor

By SUSAN HOROWITZ
Collegian Staff

Lovers of Shakespeare or the theatre will delight in the Department of Dramatic Arts and The Masquers' production of William Shakepeare's "Measure for Measure" at Amherst College.

This story of the virginal Isabella, who is asked to surrender her chastity to "the ever evil" Angelo to save her brother Claudio's head from the guillotine, is humorous in true Shakespearean tradition.

A time jump from the 17th century to early 20th century Vienna requires extreme costume changes which were superb. The opening scene, in which the entire company is promenading around the town square, is a visual pleasure for all, due to the obvious talent of Karen Gerson, the set and costumes designer.

The cast, headed by Mark A. Davis as Duke Vincentio, turned Friar turned Duke again, and Sarah Tames, as the pure Isabella, is marvelous. Tames' soliloquies move the audience, making Isabella's pain and confusion believable. Davis' performance, especially his asides, compel the audience to believe in the Duke and to trust him even when they are confused as to what exactly Duke Vincentio is doing.

The production is a bit long—close to three hours—but well worth the time because it is a play with all the elements.

There are several other outstanding performances as well. Jeff Vandersip as Claudio, Isabella's brother who is sentenced to die, convinces us of his desolation, and Nicholas Shorr is positively hateful as Angelo, the temporary Duke, who forces his demands upon Isabella.

Two other cast members -- Michael Lennon and David Fite -- deserve special acclaim. Lennon as the oversized Lucio is lovable and his scenes with the Duke are comic relief at its best.

David Fite, as Pompey the tapster, is incredible. Fite has one scene in jail where he does impressions of his fellow jail mates that put the audience in hysterics.

The production is a bit long -- close to three hours -- but well worth the time. It is a play with all the elements -- fine directing by Helene Keyssar, exquisite costumes, and excellent performances. All in all, "Measure For Measure," measures up.

"Measure For Measure" ran Oct. 19-21 and will run again this Friday through Sunday, Oct. 26-28.

Sniping repeated at Gorman

By KAREN LIBUCHA
Collegian Staff

Two more sniping incidents occurred early Sunday morning near the third floor lounge of Gorman Dormitory, which was the target of four shots last Wednesday night.

No one was injured.

UMass police unofficially said there were reports of two shootings early yesterday morning and a light bulb was broken. Police have speculated the shots were fired from a bb gun or pellet gun.

Fred Weiner, asst. Cluster coordinator from Gorman, which is in Central Residential Area, said he heard the first shot shortly after 1 a.m. "It sounded like a gunshot," Weiner said.

Weiner said a UMass police officer came to investigate but found nothing. At 2:45, a Gorman resident, Kevin Fachetti, said he heard another shot, then breaking glass.

It was not until sunrise that a spotlight next to the third floor lounge was discovered to be broken, presumably by the last shot. The third floor lounge was the target of the earlier shootings.

Quit smearing the walls with permanent crap

To the Editor:

When a group is planning and/or sponsoring an event it is necessary to publicize this event to stir up interest. In the past it has been customary to post such publicity along the well travelled walkways for all to see on their ways to classes and such. And this is all fine and dandy as long as the posters can come down once the event has taken place...

However, in the past we have seen a number of postings that are not easily removable. These postings are actually pasted to the walls such that we must look at them every time we go to classes. They include: The Mao-Tseting posters, The Amherst Smoke-in posters, The May/Day posters, and now some posters dealing with the Communist Revolution.

We consider these postings an intolerable defacing of University property and demand that they be removed post-haste!! Those responsible for those postings take note. Please be considerate when hanging up posters and DON'T make them permanent. The students can be reached without being disgusted!!

Southwest Assembly Executive Committee

Hey Julie, It works both ways

To the Editor:

It is unfortunate that Julie Eagle thinks the way she does about the corruption that supposedly takes place in UMass between male professors and female students regarding grades. She is one sided. What makes her think that female professors don't do the same thing to male students that she claims male professors do to women? Indeed this is one of the biggest problems that females who have concerns about women's rights have. They just ignore that injustices of this sort can also be directed against male too. What makes her so sure that the source of this problem is the professors and not the students themselves?

I have been in a lot of classses where some females have deliberately made very obviously suggestive passes at male professors for grade favors. More often than not, I have observed the poor professors spend a lot of their time and energy refraining from falling prey.

It is possible that Eagle's allegations are true but until such times when she can come up with some specific examples from UMass, some names, her stories are just fabrications. What a sad thing to do; fabricate stories about your own professors? The UMass Collegian is there to inform the student body of what is happening and not of just what some people think is happening.

It's the middle ages or the modern, huh?

To the Editor:

After reading "name witheld upon request's" letter in the Oct. 18 issue I would like to comment: It seems that you feel that gays consider all straights homophobic. I think that you missed the point altogether. Homophobia is basically fear of homosexuality. It is true that gays feel that many, but not all, straights are homophobic. You don't have to be gay to come to this conclusion though. Any rational person, straight (like myself) or otherwise, can see that people like you and Mr. Baron are quite scared of homosexuality in general.

Your comment about the decay of Rome (check your history please), and Mr. Baron's comment "they want to hijack it to a rest area on Route 91," (see Oct. 11) are classics. I congratulate you both.

Somehow there are still many people who feel their values threatened by homosexuality; well you have a choice, you can hide in the middle ages, or you can learn to deal with the modern world.

Soviet folks in Cuba a Cold War farce

To the Editor

The present administration's blind support of the regime of a Soviet-sponsored dictator is indicative of Jimmy Carter's inability to see through the Soviet disinformation that afflicts many power brokers in the American political process. The disease can be appropriately described as "Cold War myopia." Its symptoms are shortness or lack of vision, superficiality, pretense, and a talent for histrionics.

Why the administration intended to orchestrate the charade of a threat to U.S. security by the presence of Soviet troops in Cuba is obviously political and the timing is very well designed. Not only is the Salt Treaty, an agreement of tremendous significance for world peace and survival, being jeopardized, but also jingoist interests clamoring for a return to imperialist interventionism [Gunboat diplomacy] are being encouraged on the basis of this spurious menace. In fact, this illusory Cuban crisis is just a ploy to rationalize increased U.S. military spending and interference in the internal affairs of Latin American countries. The implicit objective is the maintenance of a waning "Pax Americana."

The supreme irony is that President Carter, a man with such a professed concern for moral and human rights, should embrace such a specious, morally bankrupt policy.

Physical Plant: You've done it again

To the Editor

I would like to invite the University community to come up to the oval playing field outside Butterfield Dormitory to observe the latest folly of the Physical Plant. At this time there is a sidewalk being constructed across the lawns and playing field in order to ensure the safety of the small children who travel across University property to and from the Wildwood School.

A noble purpose indeed. It is to be a unique roadway sidewalk in that its planners have deemed it necessary to construct it through the only level field available in the area, cutting off the last fifteen feet of the oval, so the sidewalk will curve as little as possible. To many of the dorm's residents, this cutting off of our field for no good reason is the best example we have seen recently of Physical Plant's highly developed talent for the unnecessary, aesthetically laughable, insensible, and doltish projects it makes for itself. We would like to know who is responsible for designing this walkway through a field instead of next to the road, where most sidewalds in the world are.

It is also not irrelevant that 1) virtually all of these children take a short cut through the woods and 2) the mere presence of a sidewalk does not mean these children will walk on it, as the sidewalk route is a longer way for them to get to school.

In short, we feel the ludricous, wasteful, and intellectually barren nature of this project should be known to all. Please come on up and see for yourself -- you will agree, we're sure.

Support yet another event of injustices

To the Editor:

Shortly before closing on Saturday, September 29, three Third World Women entered Russell's Liquors in downtown Amherst. They were Sheila A. Johnson, Amherst College employee; Gloria Stevens, Amherst College student; and Ada Griffin, a student at Hampshire College. According to the Amherst Student (October 4, 1979), Johnson was asked for identification while making a purchase. As she presented it, the clerk involved "flung the I.D. back at her", and an argument ensued.

Meanwhile, Stevens and Griffin had made their purchases and were leaving the store. Another clerk, thinking that the women had not paid for their liquor, told them to stop. The Amherst police were called, one of whom "reportedly pushed Griffin against a shelf of wine bottles twisted her arm behind her back, and handcuffed her. In the course of this the authorities used abusive language and racist name calling. Even as the women said they were not resisting, one of the policemen, in an attempt to control one of the women, threw her (she weighs 96 pounds) to the ground and sat on her. The three were then arrested and charged with disorderly conduct. On Oct. 24, at 9 a.m. a pre-trial hearing is scheduled for Hampshire District Court in Northampton. Please be there and show support.

'I'M WORRIED — THIS GROUP COULD MAKE THAT JOKER INSIDE LOOK HALF-WAY GOOD!'

A Swiss bank in our midst?

Jim Gagne

The Wall Street Journal reported last week that the Social-Democratic party in Switzerland has petitioned the government to dilute that countries' banking-secrecy law. The 100,000 Swiss who signed the petition to force a 1982 referendum on the issue want the "gnomes of Zurich" to disclose details of accounts to help reduce tax evasion and the transfer of "dirty money" from dictators and criminals.

It seems the influx of foreign money has pushed up the exchange rate of the Swiss franc, thereby increasing pressure on Swiss firms to move their production -- and jobs -- abroad.

This brief news item wasn't on the Journal's front page nor anywhere near it, but if we act quickly it could turn into very big news right here at UMass.

We certainly have the facilities to become an international banking center including a luxury hotel and a half-empty library that looks more like a bank tower anyway. The fees that such an operation would generate could finally turn this university into the great institution it was supposed to be. Should the referendum actually pass in Switzerland, our banking system could be expanded to include the Boston Campus, where there may also soon be an empty library.

Aside from the monetary benefits for the campus, it would be a great learning experience for the many students involved. Imagine what a business major could learn from Robert Vesco, or a political science major from Somoza or Mobutu. Let's not forget the language majors who would be needed as interpreters.

Some people are sure to say we shouldn't be dealing with dictators, capitalists and crooks. Why not? Much of their "dirty money" comes from the U.S. to begin with in the form of "foreign aid." This is just a way to keep our tax money in the country to benefit us. Besides, as Richard Nixon said about the Shah of Iran, "You don't grease the skids for your friends." We could give it a try, like the Swiss, build up the campus a bit, and then grease the skids for our so-called friends.

In fact, job opportunities would most likely increase here to handle the extra business. Switzerland is about the same size as Massachusetts and similarily it imports food and energy and exports technology. Unlike Massachusetts, Switzerland has low unemployment, low inflation, decent schools -- and secret bank accounts.

It shouldn't be too hard to bring secret banking to UMass. We can just get a copy of Switzerland's 1934 Swiss Banking Law and make the necessary changes. We can even borrow a title from the Swiss for our initiative petition. They call theirs the "People's Initiative against the Misuse of Banking Secrecy and the Power of Banks." We can call ours the "People's Initiative for the Misuse of Banking Secrecy and the Power of the Banks.

U.S. must deal with PLO

Tarek Elnabli

Ed. note -- This is the first of a two part series.

Andrew Young's resignation as U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations focused attention on what he rightly called the "ridiculous" U.S. policy of refusing to talk with the Palestinian Liberation Organization. His departure brought discernible changes in public awareness of the Middle East conflict. Now we see the Palestinian perspective is more legitimate in the eyes of many and especially in the freer political atmosphere, that is struggling to emerge, is allowing more open discussion and critiricism of Israeli policy.

Let us be historically specific without being historically captive. In the Middle East there is a historically specific judgement, which must be made: In the process of creating the state of Israel a fundamental injustice was done to the Palestinian people. The establishment of modern Israel came at a severe cost to the Palestinians -- the loss of their homes and lands.

We of course realize that at that time the Jewish people hadsuffered beyond human comprehension and that western Christiandom holds responsibility for its complicity with their victimization. In the aftermath of the horror, with the support of the western world the Jews came to Palestine seeking a national haven to protect their peoplehood. Now, however, a continuing legacy of western guilt for the holocaust is the contemporary suffering of the Palestinian people.

From the start, terrorism was used by both sides: by the Jews in their effort to secure their "right" to settle in Palestine, and form a nation, and by the Arabs in their opposition to those actions. But in our views, this does not mean that the blame and responsibility for the conflict rests evenly with all. Rather, the basic injustice inflicted on the Palestinian people place a special burden on Israel for restitution.

This responsibility, however, does not justify every response that has been made by Arabs and Palestinians. But we have to realize and understand that this kind of struggle has included repeated acts of politically rationalized "terror," a method that becomes very tempting once human life is deemed expendable in the name of liberation. The Jewish people in their history and present time did just the same kind of politically rationalized "terror."

In the Middle East there are many Palestinians who have responded more like sinners than saints to being expelled from their land, persecuted, and deprived of their rights. But this does not ease those historically injustices nor absolve Israel of its own wrong doing. Today the greater terror and violence, which maims and kills innocent civilians, is being carried out not by the PLO, but by Israel in actions such as its attacks in southern Lebanon with no reason, yet with purpose, i.e. in the name of security they kill innocent victims.

The Middle East debate always returns to the question of Israeli's right to exist!!! In the next issue of the Collegian I will examine that issue.

Law & Order

It's time for public law to rid U.S. of inequality

Jim Moran

Police harassment of citizens is, to be sure, a real problem in our society. Law enforcement officials can boast all they want about the "new" cop, for the existence of criminal justice and police science programs in our acadenic institutions serves to prove only one thing-that there is definitely no corelation between education and intelligence.

While I won't deny that there are some dedicated and sincere policemen, it has been my experience that most of them suffer from a sub-conscious malady of hypermachismo. The rhetoric of such law and order politicians as Richard Nixon and Edward King only contribute to the strength of these forces that invade the privacy of people every day.

Once having been brought to the "arena" of justice, we can see the regressive and inherently unequal facts of that system. Our Fourteenth Amendment guarantees a system of due process and equal application of the laws, yet we have seen through historical precendents that no such thing exists in the judicial institutions.

Sacco and Vanzetti, besides serving as a case study for capital punishment arguments and freedom of expression arguments also illustrate the unjustice imbedded in our court processes.

Both were poor immigrants, not abreast of the workings of United States law. Because they were "in the wrong place at the wrong time," because they may have been involved in anarchist political efforts, they were dealt with most severely. Joan Little, a black woman from North Carolina arrested for breaking into a vacant house, was put in prison. When she tried to defend herself from being raped by a prison guard, who subsequently died, she was given a life sentence for murder. In neither of these cases, initially, was there anything near approaching an adequate defense. Our courts exist to free the affluent and punish the impoverished.

But there could be a remedy to this inequity. What if a system of total public law existed? What if everyone involved in the legal process, from the clerks to the paralegals to the lawyers themselves were to become employees of the government? Public defenders, as we know them, have little reason to do a good job for their clients. In comparison to private attorneys, they are underpaid and understaffed. Many are using the positions as stepping stones to a private or corporate law practice, or using it to enhance their political careers. Supposing Patty Hearst was forced to go to F. Lee Bailey, her public lawyer. He would have no incentive to do a better job for her than for any one of his clients. Even the wealthy couldn't purchase a verdict of innocent.

Of course I realize the drawbacks of my hypothesis. Even with public law there would still be those lawyers who had the benefit of a Harvard Law School education, and those who could only obtain a degree at some state college or university. But let's assume that all our educational institutions deliver the same product.

Clearly, in order to better fulfill the ideal of equal justice for all, we need a system that is free from the conniving and obstruction brought about by the almighty dollar.

We need to socialize law.

But there are other problems outside the courtroom. What happens when a person goes to jail? It need not be mentioned in detail that prisons are a haven for drug abuse, rape and violent crimes. Nor need it be elaborated that our correctional institutions are the classrooms for learning the "tricks of the trade." They certainly don't rehabilitate. As Norman Carlson, director of the Federal Bureau of Prisons once said, "Anyone not a criminal will be one when he gets out of jail."

Data supports this contention. Almost 80 percent of the felonies in this nation are committed by repeat offenders.

And what of the condition of the prisons alone? They're overcrowded, for one thing. A Census Bureau survey of city and county jails conducted in 1970 shows that 52 percent of the inmates had not been convicted of any crimes, but were awaiting trial. They're in a state decay. Former Florida Senator Edward J. Gurney found that four jails still in use in 1971 had been built before George Washington's innaugural.

And 25 percent of all the local jails in the country are more than 50 years old. We know the horror stories of Deer Island and Walpole. Prisons are not constructive solutions to our societal ills. With the exception of the select few, like the Charles Mansons of the world, confinement is a dangerous and cruel method of ignoring a problem.

We need to look at some alternatives to the problems posed by an oppressive police network, an imbalanced judicial process and an obsolete prison system. We may not find immediate answers to our dilemma, but, as British statesman Edmund Burke once said, "All that is necessary for the triumph of evil is that good men do nothing."

Play auditions open for 'Leonce and Lena'

Auditions for the Hampshire College Theatre production of "Leonce and Lena," a comedy by German romanticist George Buchner, are tonight at 7 in Emily Dickinson Hall at the college and tomorrow at Smith College Theatre, room TI-10.

Directed by Hampshire theatre faculty member David Cohen, "Leonce and Lena" is a romantic satire revolving around the adventures of a young prince and princess who attempt to escape an arranged marriage. Scripts are on reserve at Hampshire College Library. Production dates for the play are Dec. 6-9 and 13-15 at the college's Performing Arts Center.

Major roles are available for three men and three women, with six additional roles to be cast for men and women and a small ensemble for minor roles. Five-college and community actors are eligible. For additional information, including the time for tomorrow's auditions, contact David Cohen at Hampshire College.

Social worker Lydia Nettler and her 15 month-old son were among the women who brought their children to the vigil. Nettler, who is six months pregnant, said, "The pro-choice movement is not anti-child. It is for women's right to decide."

While the coalition has not received any formal opposition from right to life groups, about 10 cars of young men passed the vigil line with shouts of "I love kids," and "Right to life." Duquet said men shouting from their cars "isvery common in Northampton. It is the norm to get harassed by men in cars. It is especially offensive in this kind of setting."

While there was little Third World support at the vigil, which dissapointed Duquet, Third World Task Force member Suman Bohm said, "I am representing the task force. We took turns going to various meetings."

Today's week long UMass reproductive rights workshops will be "Moral and Medical Issues" at 9 a.m., "Violence Against Women" at 2:30 p.m. in Campus Center rooms 911-015, and "Sterilization Abuse," in Campus Center room 175 at 7 p.m.

Booters downed by 10th ranked Rams

By MIKE ESTRADA
Collegian Staff

The University of Rhode Island Rams survived a Scott Cooper breakaway early in the first half Friday, part of a 14 shot barrage by the Minutemen, to down UMass 1-0 and remain the domineering force in New England College soccer.

Despite strong, scholarship produced soccer talent through the lineup, host UMass never ran scared, at times playing above and beyond the number ten ranked team in the country. The Minutemen's best opportunity came at the 5:00 mark when Senior Scott Cooper, after missing a start against Providence Wednesday, broke in alone against Ram goalie Gonsales Rico. Rico's fake of a slide tackle force Cooper to uncork a bit early, missing the left part of the net.

"We had some golden opportunities...and just couldn't make it work," said UMass tri-captain Mark Vasington. A UMass record of 4-3-2 is also enough to possibly exclued the Minutemen from the NCAA tournament. "You hate to say your hopes are over," Vasington said. "Maybe if we win every game..."

Oddly enough, URI's fortunate goal at 13:07 of the first half was not characteristic of a talented soccer team. Forward Len Mercurio, New England's top goal-scoreer with 15 in ten games, rifled a point-blank shot on UMass goalie Mark Marilla. The ball bounded off Marilla toward the goal where it was flicked in by sophomore Rui Caetano, the first goal scored against UMass at home this eason.

In the second half, URI went into a defensive shell with four midfielders, but the shell was nearly cracked by the hungry UMass offense that exploded for nine shots coming mostly at the end of the game. Enter goalie Rico, the underrated keeper trained personally by Ram coach Geza Henni, former goalkeeper for a World Cup Hungarian team. Rico's timing was perfect on several occasions, leaping above even the tall Minutemen backs to punch away crosses and corners.

UMass now has a week off before travelling to the University of Connecticut for a 10:00 game next Saturday morning. But, the showdown in New England could shape up between number one ranked URI and number two ranked UConn in Kingston November 17.

Rodgers captures New York marathon

NEW YORK(AP)— Bill Rodgers bided his time in the early going, then overtook young Kirk Pfeffer yesterday and won the New York Marathon for the fourth consecutive year.

The 31-year-old Rodgers, the American record holder who is considered the nation's No. 1 hope for the 1980 Olympics, was timed in an unofficial 2 hours, 11 minutes, 44 seconds in beating a record field of 14,153 entrants.

For Rodgers of Melrose, Mass., the weather was nearly perfect. The veteran distance runner, who had lost six races in a row after setting the U.S. mark of 2:09:27 in winning the Boston Marathon for the third time last April, disdains heat.

When the race began, the temperature was in the 50s and the skies were overcast. Only as the massive group of runners traversed through the five boroughs of New York did it begin to get somewhat warmer, as the sun burned through the haze.

Pats down Dolphins to take 1st in AFC East

By DAVE O'HARA
Associated Press

FOXBORO, Mass. — Steve Grogan set up two touchdowns with long overhead strikes and then passed for an insurance touchdown yesterday as the New England Patriots rallied from a 13-point deficit for a 28-13 National Football League victory over the Miami Dolphins.

Boosting their record to 6-2, the Patriots took over sole possession of first place in the American Conference East, one game aherad of Miami.

New England took command after Miami had moved in front 13-0 on a 40-yard field goal by Uwe von Schamann at 9:38 of the second period.

The Patriots moved right back to get on the board, marching 69 yards in seven plays. Grogan passed to Stanley Morgan for 41 yards and a first down at the Miami six, and four plays later, Horace Ivory went off his right tackle for one yard and the score.

New England, given a big lift by an aroused defense, went in front to stay early in the second half after George Roberts' 30-yard punt went out of bounds at the New England 41.

The Patriots moved to a first down at the Miami 47, and Grogan hit Harold Jackson with a pass for 35 yards and a first down at the 12. Three plays later, Sam Cunningham plunged into the end zone from one yard out.

Cunningham, held in check by the Miami defense most of the game , broke loose in setting up a third touchdown in the fourth period. He carried 19 yards for a first down at the Miami 29 and twice more for a first down at the 18.

Three plays later, Grogan hit Ray Jarvis with a 15-yard scoring shot into the end zone.

Linebacker Mike Hawkins finished the victory by intercepting a pass by reser ve quarterback Don Strock and racing into the end zone for the final touchdown with 1:40 remaining.

Von Schamann booted a 53- yard field goal, a Foxboro record, with the game just 3:14 old. The Dolphins made it 10-0 on their next possession, Bob Griese passing 13 yards to Bruce Hardy.

Miami threatened to turn the game into a runaway early in the second period, driving from its 20 for a first down at the New England 11. However, Larry Csonka fumbled when hit hard, and Mike Haynes recovered for the Patriots.

A couple of minutes later, New England punter Eddie Hare fumbled a low-snapped center, and Miami took over at the 18.

Unable to move, the Dolphins called on von Schamann for his second field goal. That was the last scoring threat the Dolphins were able to mount. They were held to one first down until midway through the fourth period after New England had gone in front 21-13.

Grogan completed 16 of 24 passes for 187 yards. He also had at least four other perfect passes dropped by intended receivers.

Spikers split tri-match with UConn & Williams

By MAUREEN SULLIVAN
Collegian Staff

The women's volleyball team of UMass played their sixth straight road match Saturday, as they visited Storrs, Connecticut to play UConn and Williams. The minutewomen split their third consecutive tri-match, falling to Williams, but coming back to defeat UConn.

Division II Williams gave UMass some surprises after the Minutewomen handed the Ephwomen a 15-6 loss. Surprises came in the form of three six-foot players, with these players foiling UMass at the net. Williams College pulled out wins of 15-10, 15-11, to take the match.

Against Umass, UConn lost a crucial game, and the score seemed one-sided - 15-9, 15-8. The Minutewomen were led by Ellen Braun's fine defensive work in the back court, and by Peggy Barber's superlative overall efforts, especially in blocking and serving.

Connecticut lost to UMass at the URI Tournament last month, the first time UConn had ever fallen to UMass in women's volleyball. As the season progressed, however, UConn gave several top teams trouble, such as Central Conn. and Southern Conn.; the Huskies either won crucial contests or, battled furiously in losing.

UMass coach Elaine Marasco praised her team's effort for both matches, saying "We're getting ready not only for Southern Conn. this coming weekend, but for the Regional Tournament. Considering the fact that the team hasn't played at home for six weeks, we're doing as well as the circumstances can allow."

UMass next plays Hartford and Eastern Conn. College this Tuesday night at Hartford.

Gridders shut out Rams, 24-0

by DANNY GUIDERA
Collegian Staff

Although the scoreboard did not show it until midway through the fourth quarter, the UMass gridders totally shut down the punchless Rams of the University of Rhode Island 24-0 Saturday at Alumni Stadium.

The win keeps the first place Minutemen unbeaten in Yankee Conference play, and is the fifth straight victory of the season. The homecoming crowd of 13,500, the largest to see a UMass game this season, saw the UMass offense wait until the fourth to open the flood gates, but never seriously doubted the outcome of the contest.

The Minuteman defense, spearheaded by linebacker Peter DiTomasso and defensive back Bob Manning, played another solid game, totally frustrating the Rams offense. URI had just one serious scoring opportunity early in the third quarter but Ram quarterback Doug Lewis missed a wide open Leroy Shaw and passed into the end zone where the pass was picked off by Manning.

Mike Newell's 66 yard end-around run put the Minutemen on top to stay at 2:09 of the first quarter. Sandro Vitiello kicked the extra point to make it 7-0 in the Minutemen's favor. Newell finished up with 74 yards on the day, leading UMass rushers.

An opportunity for another score was missed when quarterback Mike McEvilly threw a pass that sailed just beyond the reach of a diving Kevin O'Connor in the end zone. After another incomplete pass intended for O'Connor, Vitiello's 45-yard field goal attempt failed wide to the right of the goalpost.

Another UMass scoring chance was set up when Eric Cregan recovered a Leroy Shaw fumble at the Rhode Island 15. However, this went all for naught when tailback Cliff Pedrow fumbled the ball at the URI two yard line. It rolled into the end zone and bounced out where a Ram player recovered it somewhere on University Drive.

In the third quarter URI made their deepest penetration into Minuteman territory (to the UMass 18) but it, too, went for nothing when Lewis missed the open Shaw and instead hit Newell.

The Minuteman scoring attack got back on track at 5:44 of the fourth quarter when Pedrow made good and carried in from the one yard line capping a fifteen play 54 yard drive. The play was set up by a McEvilly to Brian Heyworth completion, good for a 22-yard gain. Heyworth caught four passes on the day.

After the Minuteman defense bottled the Rams at their own 27 yard line, McEvilly took over and hit O'Connor on a 55-yard pass play that brought UMass down to the URI two. On the next play, freshman Dan Dawson dove in to account for the third UMass touchdown of the day at 8:19.

Kevin Sullivan recovered another Shaw fumble at the URI 45 yard line and after substitute quarterback Tim Fontaine brought his troops in to striking distance. Vitiello sent a 47-yard field goal through the uprights at 13:08 to account for the last Minuteman points of the day, and putting the icing on a 24-0 whitewash.

The Minuteman offensive attack racked up a total of 426 yards against a seemingly helpless Ram defense. The rushing game accounted for 270 yards on the ground, with McEvilly netting 68 and Pedrow 67 in addition to Newell's 74.

Although Saturday was Mike McEvilly Day, the senior quarterback, who prior to the game was ranked second in the Yankee Conference, completed only nine out of 22 passes.

UMass coach Bob Pickett explained that, although the points were not on the scoreboard for most of the game, he was not concerned that the Minutemen would lose. "Sometimes you just get complacent with this defense," he said, "you can wait for the team to score because you know the 'D' will hold them." He added that while there probably should have been more points on the board in the first three quarters, the offense played well. "Look at the stats," he said, referring to the yardage rolled up during the game.

Looking ahead to next week's game with the University of Connecticut (at Storrs, Conn.) Pickett said at the beginning of the season he picked the Huskies as the team with the "best opportunity to win the Yankee Conference with the personel concerned."

The game ball was awarded to senior offensive guard Steve Wojes.

Women harriers gain NE title

The UMass Women's Cross-Country team had good reason to celebrate Saturday after returning to UMass as New Englands Champions in their biggest win of the season. All running their best times of the season, the top five Minutewomen triumphed over meet favorite UVM 66-77 on Vermont's home course in the 28-team field.

Sophomore Judy McCrone, sixth, ran a personal best of 17:41 for the 5,000 meter (3.1 mile) course. Finishing close to McCrone and in the top ten was sophomore Cathy Petrick, ninth, who ran to a personal best of 18:03. McCrone and Petrick have run consistently in the top two spots for the Minutewomen throughout the season.

"Judy and Cathy ran their best, but the real improvements were Julie Burke, Linda Welzel and Tricia Moores," Coach Pete Pfitzinger said. Burke, 14th, improved her previous best for the season by 17 seconds, finishing in 18:14. Welzel, 16th, ran a best season time of 18:26 while adding important points to increase the UMass lead. Sophomore Tricia Moores, finished a surprising 21st in the field of 185 of New England's best runners while turning in a season best of 18:31. "They won the meet for us, half of the teams couldn't get one runner in our top five," Pfitzinger said.

The windy, dry course with its rolling hills proved to be a key in the UMass strategy. "They had to get out quick because the course became narrow and turned right out after the start. We had our top five in the top 30 spots after 300 yards. By the time the women reached the ¾ mile mark we were winning," Pfitzinger said.

"We really had to go out fast. If it was up to me I would have liked to go out slow and pick it up at the end, but I flew in front because of the crowds. I wasn't expecting us to win. I don't think anybody thought that we were going to win, so it was a real surprise when we heard the results," sophomore Cathy Petrick, the finished ninth said.

In team scoring UVM placed second, UNH third, Brown fourth, and Dartmouth fifth, all providing the competition for UMass. "In a big meet the points are very important in overall scoring. I told the women to try to pass at least two runners each in the last half mile of the race. If they each could do that it would put us ahead 10 more points," Pfitzinger said.

Joan Benoit, of Bowdoin College, won the race in 16:46. Benoit holds the women's record in the Boston Marathon and is also a nationally ranked road racer.

"We've had success, but we've only done one speed workout and more strength workouts. There's no way we're on a peak. I can only see us getting better," Pfitzinger said.

The Minutewomen's next meet will be this Friday at UNH. The UNH meet should be close because of their showing at the New Englands. UMass beat UNH 66-94 in Saturday's meet.

Runners place 3rd in YanCon meet

By JANE WOLFSON

KINGSTON, R.I.—Saturday afternoon the UMass men's cross country team suffered another disappointing meet, when they placed third out a field of seven in the Yankee Conference Championships, an event in which they had won for the past nine years.

The meet, held at the University of Rhode Island in Kingston, R.I. was won by the University of Connecticut, which finished with a score of 41 points. New Hampshire finished directly behind them with 46 points. NH's Gary Crossan, a senior, won the 10,000 meter (6.2 miles) event with a time of 30:48.

Placing next were the Minutemen with an overall score of 56 points. Finishing first for UMass was senior captain Rick Walls, who came across eighth. UMass also placed the ninth and tenth runners as well; Sophomore Paul Beaulieu and senior Steve MacDougall, with times of 31:58 and 32:00 respectively.

Also placing for the harriers were junior Paul Kirksey (13th, 32:17) and junior Kevin Molteni (16th, 32:26). Finishing behind the Minutemen were Vermont 104, Maine 125, URI 128, and Boston University 194.

"The team ran well," said MacDougall. "It was just that UConn and New Hampshire ran exceptionally. It was the first of three important meets leading to the nationals. If we could have won here it would have been really positive. But because everyone's a little bit mad we should run better next weekend," he said.

"The dual meets at the beginning of the season are mainly to get us going. So the upcoming meet at Penn State and the qualifying for the nationals will be our most intense meets," concluded MacDougall.

UMass came out with good position on the course and after the first mile split they were running upfront, as a whole, clearly dominating the field. But, after the four mile split, where the course goes into the woods and up the only hill, UMass weakened and Connecticut and New Hampshire were able to gain momentum, and the race looked about over for the Minutemen.

But, coming to the last stretch of the race UMass picked up and strong finishes by Walls, MacDougall, and Kirksey were the optimistic notes of the afternoon.

"We didn't run aggressively enough," said Beaulieu. "Physically we were ready, mentally our concentration wasn't there," explained Beaulieu.

Next Monday the harriers will travel to College Park, PA to participate in the Penn State Invitational.

The occassion was the dedication of the DuBois homesite (known as the House of the Black Burghardts) as a national historic landmark. The homesite was dedicated as a park on October 18,1969 and ten years later the federal government finally dedicated the homesite as an historic landmark. As most of the dignitaries noted, the dedication is long overdue.

Inside the Tanglewood Concert Theatre, where approximately eight hundred people gathered. The ceremony began with recordings of music by the late Paul Robeson setting the mood of the people in sense of power and reflection.

The New Africa House Choir followed with a beautiful rendetion of songs such as 'Lift Every Voice,' 'Walkin with the King,' 'Draw close', and 'Keep me in your Care', among others. The choir will definitely be remembered for their performance.

Homer Meade, master of ceremonies opened with remarks about the accomplishments of Dr. DuBois through 96 years of his life. We were then treated to a recording of Dr. DuBois who explained his college career at Fisk University, where he did his undergraduate work. It was at Fisk that a young DuBois from a white community, committed himself to the task of bringing down racial barriers. The all Black Fisk University brought DuBois in touch with his people and sensitized him to our problems.

David Graham DuBois, the son of the late Dr. DuBois, travelled from Cairo, Egypt, to attend the ceremonies. He stated that "the DuBois legacy must not be allowed to die but must be passed on to the children. It requires protection from those who would coopt it,distort it and make it something Dr. DuBois did not want it to be." He pledged that as heir, he would do all he could to ensure that the legacy of Dr. DuBois lives on. Mr. DuBois also expressed his gratitude to the Interior Department which has recognized, although late, the accomplishments of Dr. DuBois.

Next at the podium was Walter Wilson a co-founder, financial backer, and executive secretary of the DuBois Memorial Committee.

Mr. Wilson said that Dr. DuBois was not a July fourth patriot whose talents were not used by America. He fought for human rights, civil rights, made many friends and the proper enemies.

It was Mr. Wilson who purchased the site of the DuBois homesite and did a lot of work to see it become a park, and later a National Landmark.

Mr. Wilson told the people of the opposition to the dedication of the Park in 1969, from the John Birch Society, some veterans and the F.B.I. J. Edgar Hoover made many attempts to stop the dedication of the park but none worked.

The Ghanaian Ambassador to the United States and Mexico, Dr. Quaison Sackey continued with tributes to DuBois when he said that DuBois "was a man of vision and faith, an African and a humanitarian. He spent his whole life fighting for humanity. He inspired many Africans many of whom are today the leaders of Africa.

Dr. Sackey went on to say that all black people are of African descent. "We might have come here on different ships, but we are all in the same boat."

He reminded the crowd that "we are producing a Mecca for DuBois in Great Barrington, but there is a Mecca for him in Ghana, which we must visit." Dr. Sackey concluded that "at last, at last, America has received its own."

Former U Mass Chancellor Randolph Bromery mentioned that he and the Ghanaian Ambassador had two different invitations at two different dedications at two different ends of the state, on the same day. They choose, however to come to this one.

He said that the DuBois papers are the largest single collection of papers in the country (second totally to the Adams collection which was that of a whole family). Bromery stated that Dr. DuBois made a habit of retaining every piece of paper that he collected, including receipts from a silk vest bought by his father in the 1800's. It is indeed a remarkable collection of work that must be read by everyone.

Micheal Thelwell of the UMass Afro-Am Department paid what was the most moving tribute to the late DuBois.Thelwell said that "although the federal government has finally recognized DuBois, let us not forget that it was this same government during the McCarthy hysteria that forced the man into exile rather than face imprisonment.

Thelwell further stated that "the dedication to Dr. DuBois honors not DuBois but Berkshire County and all of us here."

Tributes flowed in memory of DuBois from many other dignitaries, including the Counselor to the Embassy of the Peoples Republic of China, Margret Bush Wilson of the N.A.A.C.P. and Dr. John Doby of the Berkshire Community College and Julian Bond.

Dr. Herbert Aptheker, author and Literary Executor of the DuBois papers delivered the keynote address. Dr. Aptheker stated that Dr. DuBois was a man of steadfastness, energy, and passion. He was a man who could work hard in the face of opposition.

The dedication of the DuBois homesite as an historic national landmark was a ceremony that will be remembered by all present. It was finally a recognition by the federal government of the important status of Dr. DuBois to American and world history.

William Edward Burghardt DuBois was an editor, activist, educator, and world statesman. I hope that Americaand the world will learn from such a brilliant man.

THE HOUSE OF THE BLACK BURGHARDTS

"IF one slips out the northern neck of Manhattan and flies to the left of the silver Sound, one swoops in time onto the Golden River; and dodging its shining beauty, now right, now left, one comes after a hundred miles of lake, hill and mountain, in the Old Bay State. Then at the foot of high Mt. Everett one takes a solemn decision: left is sweet, old Sheffield; but pass it stolidly by and slip gently right into tiny South Egremont which always sleeps. Then wheel right again and come to Egremont Plain and the House of the Black Burghardts.

"It is the first home that I remember. There my mother was born and all her nine brothers and sisters. There perhaps my grandfather was born, although that I do not know. At any rate, on this wide and lovely plain, beneath the benediction of gray-blue mountain and the low music of rivers, lived for a hundred years the black Burghardt clan. Up and to the east on a hill of rocks was Uncle Ira; down and to the south was Uncle Harlow in a low, long, red house beside a pond—in a house of secret passages, sudden steps, low, narrow doors and unbelievable furniture. And here right in the center of the world was Uncle Tallow, as Grandfather Othello was called:

"It was a delectable place—simple, square and low, with the great room of the fireplace, the flagged kitchen, half a step below, and the lower woodshed beyond. Steep, strong stairs led up to Sleep, while without was a brook, a well and a mighty elm. Almost was I born there myself but that Alfred Du Bois and Mary Burghardt honeymooned a year in town and then brought me as a baby back to Egremont Plain.

"I left the home as a child to live in town again and go to school. But for furtive glimpses I did not see the house again for more than a quarter century. Then riding near on a chance journey I suddenly was homesick for that house. I came to the spot. There it stood, old, lonesome, empty. Its windowless eyes stared blindly on the broad, black highway to New York. It seemed to have shrunken timidly into itself. It had lost color and fence and grass and up to the left and down to the right its sister homes were gone—dead and gone with no stick nor stone to mark their burial.

"From that day to this I desperately wanted to own that house for no earthly reason that sounded a bit like sense. It was 130 long miles from my work. It was decrepit almost beyond repair save that into its tough and sturdy timbers the black Burghardts had built so much of their own dumb pluck that—

"'Why the stairs don't even creak!" said She, climbing gingerly aloft.

"But I fought the temptation away. Yachts and country estates and limousines are not adapted to my income. Oh, I inquired of course. The replies were discouraging. And once every year or so I drove by and stared sadly; and even more sadly and brokenly the House of the Black Burghardts stared back.

"Then of a sudden Somebody whose many names and places I do not know sent secret emissaries to me on a birthday which I had firmly resolved not to celebrate. Sent emissaries who showed me all the Kingdoms of this World, including something in green with a cupola; and also The House; and I smiled at the House. And they said by telegram: The House of the Black Burghardts is come home again —it is yours!

"Whereat in great joy I celebrated another birthday and drew plans. And from its long hiding-place I brought out an old black pair of tongs. Once my grandfather, and mayhap his, used them in the great fireplace of the House. Long years I have carried them tenderly over all the earth. The sister shovel, worn in holes, was lost. But when the old fireplace rises again from the dead on Egremont Plain, its dead eyes shall see not only the ghosts of old Tom and his son Jack and his grandson Othello and his great grandson, me—but also the real presence of these iron tongs resting again in fire worship in the House of the Black Burghardts."

MILITARY COUP IN EL SALVADOR

400 Persons Have Disappeared
The Popular Movement
Has Declared It A Washington Maneuver

SAN SALVADOR, Oct. 18 — El Salvador's new army-backed junta made an open bid for popular support today by announcing plans to recognize the Cuban Government and to investigate the whereabouts of more than 400 persons who have disappeared.

The five-man junta, which includes two colonels and three civilians, also promised to listen to the demands of the country's militant peasant and labor groups, which "must understand that the Government is no longer their enemy."

But the junta, named by young army officers who on Monday overthrew the repressive regime of President Carlos Humberto Romero, continued struggling to gain some credibility with a public numbed by 47 years of military rule.

The country's powerful peasant-worker-student coalitions, made up of the Popular Revolutionary Bloc, the February 28 Popular Leagues and the United Popular Action Front, have all denounced the coup as a maneuver to deceive the people and weaken the popular movements. The Popular Forces of Liberation, a Marxist guerrilla group, also charged the new junta with acting on instructions from Washington.

Some Policies Unclear

At their first press conference today, it was apparent that the junta leaders had not had time to determine their policy toward many of the issues raised by reporters. On several occasions, the junta members consulted at length before responding to questions.

But on the pressing issue of the whereabouts of some 250 political prisoners and 437 persons who have disappeared, Col. Adolfo Arnoldo Majano said that a special commission made up of representatives of the Red Cross, the Archbishop's Office and a Committee of Mothers of Missing Persons would investigate the entire problem. "The gates of the country's jails will be open for them to look where they want to," he said. "I personally have no knowledge about political prisoners. I've never even been inside a jail."

In an opening statement, read by Román Mayorga Quiroz, former rector of the Jesuit-run Central American University, the junta said that the "military insurrection" had been justified by repression, corruption and "the socio-economic structure of the country which is the main reason for its misery and poverty."

But Mr. Mayorga insisted that "we will not allow the military insurrection to become just another coup d'état because we are not here so that things can return to the way they were." He added: "We aspire to a new and just society and reject the decadent civilization that has been maintained at a high cost to the population."

Arguing that the new Government had been well received by the country, Colonel Majano said that curfew would begin two hours later — at midnight — and run until 5 A.M. He also promised that the state of seige would be lifted as soon as possible.

The junta, which includes Col. Jaime Abdul Gutiérrez, an army engineer, Guillermo Manuel Ungo, a Social Democratic politician, and Mario Antonio Andino, a liberal businesman, also made the following points:

¶The junta will strengthen ties with Nicaragua's revolutionary Government and move toward re-establishment of diplomatic ties with Havana.

¶The junta is transitional and free elections will be held before the previously scheduled date of February 1982.

¶There was no involvement by the United States or any other foreign government in Monday's coup.

¶The security forces that have been repressive — the National Guard, the Treasury Police and the National Police — will be reorganized and new directors have been named to head all three.

¶Officials from the ousted government of Mr. Romero, who is now in exile in Guatemala, will be held responsible for acts of corruption and brutality.

The new junta is expected to name its cabinet after further consultations with the groups that would be affected. One suggestion put to the junta by former President Fidel Sánchez Hernández is that these groups should submit nominees, with lawyers proposing the new attorney general, doctors the new health minister and teachers the new education minister.

TANZANIA

ROUGH ROAD AHEAD

[AN] Speaking in Dar es Salaam at the conclusion of a nationwide tour in early September, Tanzanian President Nyerere repeated an often-heard theme when he called for sacrifices in the name of economic reconstruction—this time on account of the recent war with Uganda. With fuel prices up 21% this year, the president observed, city residents could make a contribution by walking to work instead of depending on vehicle transport. For many government officials, he remarked to general laughter, walking would both help conserve fuel and trim potbellies.

In spite of the light touches in the president's speech, Tanzania's economic plight is hardly a laughing matter. Finance Minister Edwin Mtei has placed the cost of the war at almost $500 million, including $227 million in direct purchases and expenses for the army. Most of this sum had to be diverted from funds for other purposes, with the result that only 46% of the scheduled development projects of the ministries and regions for fiscal year 1978/79 were carried out. And the balance of payments position, already in deficit by $150 million for 1977/78, showed a $215 million gap in 1978/79, which was expected to reach $350 million by the end of the next fiscal year.

In July Tanzania issued a confidential appeal to nine donor nations—the U.S., Britain, West Germany, Canada, Sweden, the Netherlands, Norway, Denmark and Japan—for some $375 million in additional long-term loans or grants, to supplement conventional support from the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank. The response, however, has been limited, with only four countries—Britain, Sweden, Holland and the Federal Republic of Germany—so far coming through with special reconstruction funds. U.S. assistance—running at some $25 million a year—is likely to increase only slightly in fiscal year 1980.

In part donors have held back on the grounds that they have no provisions for financing costs of a war (although all nine "quietly applauded Tanzania's toppling of Amin," in the words of a Washington Post report). It should be noted, however, that Tanzania is already a heavy aid recipient, getting over $100 million annually from the World Bank and some $70 to $80 million from Sweden each year (in each case more than any other African nation), as well as smaller sums from other donor countries. And, while the leadership of President Nyerere and Tanzania's non-aligned stance still command respect, there is increasing disillusionment from many quarters about the country's economic future.

French agronomist Rene Dumont, a socialist whose views on giving priority to rural development have been highly influential in Tanzania, visited that country earlier this year and reported that while the strategy may be sound, bureaucratic misjudgments and heavy-handedness have contributed to a decline in agricultural production. Although Dumont believes Tanzania still stands up well in agricultural performance when compared with other African states, he notes that party and government bureaucrats tend to dominate rather than protect peasant interests.

Dumont's objections parallel criticisms issued from both the political left and right of the Tanzanian leadership. Among the most frequent targets of the critics is the 'villagization' scheme, which began by encouraging voluntary ujamaa villages in 1969, and was followed by forced villagization after 1973. The results: Collective production is minimal, as peasants still give priority to their private plots, but neither is private initiative fostered with adequate government aid.

Although the Tanzanian government leadership is itself willing to admit many of the problems raised by critics, it would be misleading to paint a picture of total failure. Lack of foreign exchange, which was aggravated by the war and which particularly affects industrial development and the implementation of new projects, stems only in part from declines in export crops and other difficulties internal to Tanzania. External factors such as price rises for oil and other imported goods, and fluctuations in the prices paid for coffee, sisal and other Tanzanian exports, have also been of major significance.

In spite of all the problems, moreover, Tanzania has made significant advances in production of food crops, and now seems to be planning seriously for recovery of export production. From 1961 to 1976, production of the staple food crops, corn and sorghum, increased threefold; cassava increased 65%; and significant advances were made in previously little-cultivated wheat and rice. After a long period of low profits for farmers, higher prices paid in the last few years, together with more favorable weather, have produced adequate harvests of corn and other basic grains, enough to increase storage from some 100,000 tons in 1976 to 500,000 tons this year. Marketed production in the 1979/80 season, it was predicted, would be only slightly less than the 1978/79 total of 486,000 tons.

Export crops, however, showed serious declines in virtually every sector from 1977 to 1978, and this June the government's producer prices for cashews, cotton, tea, tobacco and pyrethrum were increased by 25% in hopes of reversing the trend. A particular emphasis is being laid on rebuilding sisal exports, in which Tanzania is the world's leader. The plant, used in the manufacture of rope and course fabrics, has been faced with severe competition from synthetic materials, and Tanzanian production dropped 54% between 1968 and 1978. As oil prices push up the cost of many synthetic substitutes, however, planners see new marketing opportunities. Additional sisal cutters are now being recruited, and an investment of up to $80 million is being considered for modernization of the plantations.

Economic advance in export agriculture and in the industrial sector will be arduous, for there is no sign that the structural obstacles of poverty or bureaucracy will shift soon. With basic food production in relatively good shape, however, the country has at least one strong asset on which to rely during the hard times to come. ■

The Struggle and its Implications

By Gary Lee

Self-determination is a basic human right. At the Zimbabwe (I refuse to recognize the Rhodesia part of the name because it is and always has been illegal) Peace Conference which is entering its fifth week in London, The Issue is self—determination for the majority, the mass of people, without any special considerations for anyone.

The Farcial government of Bishop Abel Muzorewa is practically a carbon-copy of the illegal regime that Ian Smith declared independent from Britain in 1965. If we trace this development back further we cannot ignore the despicable actions of white settlers who, advocatiny a white supremacist ideology plundered the land and culture of the indigenous peoples in the 1500's. Anyway, that is history which is often conveniently overlooked when some folks argue for special priveleges for whites and play up their anti-communist concern.

So our Afrikan sisters and brothers have been fighting a war for their basic human rights for more than four hundred years. And when Ian Smith saw the tide of independence for former colonies sweeping towards Rodesia, he made a Unilateral Declaration of Independence (UDI) from Britain in 1965. This was to avoid Britain's handing over power to a majority—elected government. This was a very slick move that tested the backbone of the British government, which has been shown to be weak because they offered Mr. Smith immuniky from prosecution and allow him to continue to be a reactionary and disruptive presence at the Peace Conference.

Instead of drawing up a constitution resembling those that Afrikan nations adopted when acquiring independence, Britain has drafted a ridiculous document that grants whites special priveleges. The extent of those priveleges hasn't been revealed yet, but the last constitution gave whites twenty percent of parliamentary representation (even though they are only three percent of the population!) with an overriding veto, control of the Judiciary and military. Now I ask you, is this the road to self—determination? The patriotic front only recently accepted this document at the urging of the front—line states and a wish to move on to debating questions of transitionary control and elections. They also found themselves in the position of being excluded from the talks, according to British Foreign Minister Lord Carrington who would have continued to negotiate with Muzorewa et Al.

It appears that British and Muzorewean preoccupation with the issue of race is an attempt to obscure the more universal economic, political, and human rights issues. While we cannot dismiss the fact that race has been a major factor in continuing oppression of the mass of people in Zimbabwe and elsewhere in Afrika, we must not overlook the significance of economic, social, and political ideologies. Whites have usually been the first ones to make an issue of skin color anywhere in the world, particularly in Africa and the U.S. The evidence is everywhere and by citing slavery, the extermination of Native Americans, Chinese Exclusion Acts, and the K.K.K. I think I've made my case.

Zimbabwe is a veritable storehouse of natural resources and minerals, as is most of Southern Afrika and they issue of who controls these resources is an important one. By opting for a primarily socialist economy whereby the masses of the country (be it Azania, Mexico, or Namibia) would control such resources, the capitalist bloodsuckers would be thwarted in their quest to rule the world. Lest anyone not follow my line of reasoning, I pose the question why is there such a preoccupation with stifling nationalist, communist, and socialist movements around the world? What is it about communism that makes it so umpalatable to die—hard capitalists? Surely the threat of socialism can't be that ominous.

Most of Afrikan society from time immemorial has functioned in a communal way. The society operated best in this manner, and the white supremacists created the skin color issue and sought t to make profit from the division of labor. The Afrikans merely wanted their land to work on. Having land which one controls gives and individual a certain amount of freedom since they can build and—or farm on it. This concept has not been lost on the bloodsuckers who continue to plunder the earth.

So as we enter the twenty—first century, it is evident that as long as people cannot control their own land and thereby determine their own destiny they will continue to fight, and rightly so.

And in defiance of the free market capitalists I say that "Cooperation not competition is the 'civilized' way to go".

African Briefs

TRADE AND AID: The second Lome pact between the nine European Economic Community (EEC) countries and 58 African, Caribbean, and Pacific (ACP) developing nations will be signed on October 31 in the Togo capital.

Many developing countries feel that the five-year agreement, worth $7.8 billion in trade and aid, is inadequate. Some Europeans were surprised, however, that the basic level of aid was not only maintained but slightly increased in a period of growing conservatism among the industrialized nations.

Several aspects of the pact still need to be worked out, such as terms for guarantying investments in developing countries and EEC agreement on which additional comodities, notably tobacco and sisal, will be included in the Export Earnings and Stablization Scheme. Lome II will take effect when the first agreement expires next month.

DISQUALIFICATIONS SPARK PROTEST: Fifteen hundred Kenya university students marched through the streets of Nairobi October 7 to protest the decision by the Executive Committee of the ruling KANU party to once again exclude from the upcoming elections Oginga Odinga and four other former members of the now banned Kenya People's Union. Two Nairobi dailies also criticized the decision, saying a prime opportunity for reconciliation had been lost.

Besides the five, four other aspirants were disqualified from parliamentary places, but some 800 candidates will vie for less than 200 seats. (AN(

GUILTY VERDICT FOR RHOODIE: Eschel Rhoodie, the official responsible for 'dirty tricks' in the South African Information Department's 'Muldergate' scandal, has been found guilty of five of seven counts of fraud. The former information secretary, who was charged with embezzling roughly $96,000 of the $72 million involved in his clandestine activities, has been sentenced to six years in jail, with another six-year term to run concurrently.

Rhoodie's claim that the money was reinbursment for his payments to 'anonymous collaborators' was labelled 'a made up story' by Judge Charl Theron. Rhoodie maintains he is not guilty and threatens to disclose further evidence damaging to top South African officials unless he receives 'a fair trial.' He was released on bail October 9 and his lawyer has filed an appeal.

NEW AFRICA HOUSE STEERING COMMITTEE

The purpose of this article is to inform the U Mass ThirWorld Community of the existence and functions of the New Africa House Steering Committee and to announce a major reconvening meeting on Thursday October 25,1979 at 4:30 p.m. in Yvonne's Restaurant in New Africa House. Any current assessment of the New Africa House Steering Committee must first begin with the history of the organization and the reasons for its inception.

Historical Background

The history behind the New Africa House Steering Committee as with other Third World student organizations should be viewed in the proper content of the Black studentmovementofthe1960'sand early 1970's. It seems many Third World freshman and sophomores here at UMass are quite unaware of the existence of a Black student movement in the late 1960's and early 70's which proved to be a catalyst and a rallying cry for several features which are present today in White College campuses. Among these were demands for an increase in the number of Third World students, an increase in the Third World student organizations, relevant Third World curriculum, Black, Latin and Asian studies, and increases in Third World faculty and administrators. The University of Massachusetts was not exempt from these demands and with the inception of the CCEBS program in 1968, after only 40 Black students were in attendance at UMass, the number of Third World students began to increase.

In November of 1968 Black students, responding to numerous physical assaults and an indifferent administration, marched on Whitmore, occupied the building and issued a list of 20 demands. Among these demands was a call for a Black studies program, an increase in Black faculty and staff, a disarming of campus police, a declared administrative effort to combat campus racism, and the establishment of a Black Cultural Center among others. However, when the administration was tepid in implementing the demands which they had accepted, Black students seized New Africa House (then known as Mills House). The building was taken over by 200 Black students (everyone got down on the takeover) for 24 hours and the very next day the administration declared Mills house a Black Cultural Center.

Formation of New Africa House Steering Committee

Shortly after the takeover of the building which soon became known as New Africa House, the faculty senate and the board of trustees declared the W.E.B. DuBoos Department of Afro-American Studies an official academic department. In addition, Black students formed the New Africa programming immediately. The first program initiated by the Steering Committee involved musician Marion Brown, Muhal Richard Abrams, Steve McCallanda featured poet Amos Moore.

In the summer of 1970 a compromise was reached between Black students and Black faculty due to pressure from the administration concerning the legal administration of New Africa House. The compromise reached by Black student and faculty stated that the Afro-American Studies Department would take over the administrative responsiblity of the building but would recognize the New Africa House Steering Committee as the House Steering Committee and took on the responsibilities of administrating New Africa House and the programming and policies of the Black Cultural Center. The Steering Committee invited CCEBS, Upward Bound, and the Afro-American Studies Department to house their offices in the New Africa House. The Steering Committee received operating funds from the Whitmore Administration and began responsible body for hiring the cultural center coordinators, programming and polices of the Cultural Center, the allocation of space in New Africa House among other responsibilities. New Africa House thus became declared an academic building instead of a Cultural Center for administrative purposes.

The Cultural Center directors thus far have been Amos Moore, Bill Hasson, Aisha Rahman and currently Van Jackson, who has been director since 1975. As part of its operating procedure the Steering Committee has always had a student chairman and a membership comprised mostly of students. In the past non-student members have included the Cultural Center director, staff from CCEBS and a faculty member the W.E.B DuBois Department of Afro-American Studies.

At present the New Africa House Steering Committee sits waiting for concerned Third World students to take the initiative to resurrect it. This organization is very important to Third World survival on this campus for not only does it have inherent power but also great potential as a think tank, a forum for Third World unity and a process for bringing Third World faculty and staff working more closely together with Third World students. This organization must be resurrected and supported - our future depends on it.

All serious and interested students please come to an organizational meeting of the New Africa House Steering Committee on Thursday October 25 at 4:30 in Yvonne's Restaurant in New Africa House. An attempt will be made to serve refreshments at the meeting.

Beginning with this issue of Nummo News, a weekly page of Asian Affairs will be presented alongside those of African and Latin American Affairs.

Articles representing Third World views and opinions are a vital necessity, especially when most things that we read these days fail to cover many issues concerning Third World peoples. When they do, often they come from a white European-American viewpoint which dominates not only what we read but how we all live.

Asian Affairs will cover many contemporary political, social, economic and racial problems that face the peoples of the largest and most populous continent of the world. The emergence of China in global politics, the dictatorial regimes such as those in South Korea and the Philippines and the continuing devastation in Indo-China, including the sufferings of those people caught in the political conflicts of their nations, are issues that will be covered among others.

The problems of Asian in America are similar to those of other minorities. However, Asians face discrimination and difficulties in many other ways and the problems that exist in Chinatowns and Little Tokyo's across the country are different from those of fellow struggling Blacks, Chincano and Native Americans.

Not only will we present issues that are relevant to Asians to create greater awareness among all peoples, but we hope to present poems and essays that will also reflect our concerns, problems and aspirations.

We welcome any contributions and comments. If you have any ideas or articles that you would like to add, just contact me through the office of the Asian-American Students Association.

Richard Mei, Jr.
Asian Affairs Editor

THE ASIAN AMERICAN STUDENTS ASSOCIATION

The Asian American Students' Association was conceived in 1974 by students like yourself. They, as we do now, realized that an education at UMass could be more than just going to class and studying. Once more, learning can also mean finding out about yourself as an Asian American. Since 1974 we have had social gathering like potluck dinners, picnics, coffeehouses and dances to major regional conferences involving hundreds of people. We have supported Asian American studies at UMass and issues concerning Asian Americans on a national scale. The Asian American Review, a campus literary magazine is our own publication. All of this and much more is the result of willing students like yourself. Do you have an idea or a project in mind that you would like to share• A film series or an art exhibit perhaps• Or would you like to help out on one• Whatever it is, the accent is on Asian American. Come and see us in room 415 at the Student Union or watch the Collegian for one of our events or meeting announcements. In any case, have a little fun while doing something meaningful during your stay at UMass.

Join the Asian American Students Association.

What is CCEBS?

by Sartreina Cooper

The Committee for the Collegiate Education of Black Students (CCEBS) started in 1966 by a group of concerned Black faculty and staff at the University, but, it was not until September, 1968 that the first CCEBS class entered the University of Massachusetts. The program then began to recruit and assist Black, Asian-Americans, Spanish-speaking, and low income students in admissions and providing them with economic and academic assistances. CCEBS then began to organize many programs and structures to assist students in their educational pursuits as well as adjusting to the university.

The aims of the CCEBS program are accomplished through three components; Academic Services, Personal Counseling and Graduate Career Counseling. These three components work together to provide students with the necessities of adjusting to university life.

Out of CCEBS emanated many other programs; the W.E.B. DuBois Department of Afro-American Studies; Drum, a Black literary magazine whos' first editor was a CCEBS student; the Black Scientists' Society; the African Institution of Martial Arts; the Black Repertory Theater, the Voices of New Africa House Choir; the Black Dance Theater Workshop; and Nummo News which supplies weekly news by and about Third World people.

CCEBS also expresses Latino energies through AHORA and BCP, a Bilingual Cultural Program.

The CCEBS program is housed in twelve offices which are located on the second floor of New Africa House; phone 545-0031. The director, Doctor Carol J. Carter, and her staff are available for inquiries and assistance. There are CCEBS counselors available for minority students of every class Monday thru Friday. Next weeks issue will contain a write-up on the CCEBS counselors concerning their jobs as CCEBS counselors and their goals for the coming year.

ABORTION FUNDING

Since Medicard Funds have been cut off for abortion it is very difficult - for 3rd world women and for poorer white women to get abortions. But for white women of higher economic brackets they can still manage to go to their spic and span secret clinics and get their abortions when they want. Us other women are not so lucky. Either we end up getting sterilized like they do to cats and dogs, or we have to face the horrors of back alley coat-hangar style abortions which will cause irreperable damage to our bodies.

Unfortunately, this is the way things are. Not very good.

As a member of the Third World Women's Task Force and also of the Committee to End Sterilization Abuse, I feel that it is necessary to point out that the right to abortion is denied to low income women. Yet at the same time that this is true, HEW continues to fund 90 percent of the cost for permanent sterilization operations of 3rd world women and lower-class white women. Women end up getting sterilized not because they want to but because they have no alternatives. Such pressures and laws show that the government has no concern for us. The government, in making its laws, totally ignores the social and psychological situations that many women find themselves in. For many of us abortion is sometimes necessary, since it is difficult for low income women to decide to bring children into the world when the fact is that our society does not provide good medical care or adequate daycare facilities or adequate jobs or other basic needs. Especially given the risks and failures of all birth control methods, many low income women will be forced to "choose" a federally funded sterilization to prevent an unwanted pregnancy. Since abortions are illegal, sterilizations become a necessity. We do not think this is a good solution.

This is not a small problem, this problem of stupid insensitive laws. The problem is not just here on the US mainland, it is also in other places controlled by the US for instance in Puerto Rico. Just like here, in Puerto Rico abortion is illegal and sterilization abuse is rampant - 38 percent of all women of childbearing age are sterilized. Once again it is the choice of a permanent irreversible sterilization or nothing at all. High-pressure population control is used as a brutal substitute for social change. The poor remain poor with or without babies. The fact that this is happening in Puerto Rica shows how racistly people (women) of color are treated.

And what is true there is true here.

We have to remember that it is always the same group of people that is violating our human rights - whether in the factories, the prisons, office buildings, schools or medical offices. Ultimately it is the people who control this country, the wealthiest people, the ones who benefit the most from messing up 3rd world people and the working poor. They apparently will stop at nothing to keep us down. If they can not ruin our wombs, they wait until our children come out of the wombs and then they mess them up. Anything to make sure that they themselves - the already powerful - keep power. It is time for women and men to come together and fight the wave of repression now underway.

Aquisition of H.M. Bond papers celebrated

On October 22nd the University Library, University of Massachusetts Amherst, will formally announce its acquisition of the Horace Mann Bond Papers. This extensive collection of a distinguished black educator will be a prime resource for scholars in the fields of black education, African affairs and related topics. The Bond Papers, together with the W.E.B. DuBois Papers already resident at the University, constitute a national treasure.

Also to be celebrated is the naming of the Horace Mann Bond Center for Equal Education. This Center, a national clearinghouse of research and information housed in the University's School of Education, publishes the journals Integrateducation and Research Review of Equal Education, as well as other, related material. The Center is dedicated to Dr. Bond's belief in the right of every child to learn and to grow.

Please join us and members of Dr. Bond's familyMrs. Julia Bond and Georgia State Senator Julian Bond-in this long overdue tribute to a distinguished scholar and leader.

SGA fights to control funds

By ED LEVINE
Collegian Staff

The latest conflict between the Student Government Association and UMass administrators centers on the allocation and control of student funds.

The administration is supporting a Board of Trustees mandate requiring the separation of the Student Activities Trust Fund into specific categories. Administrators also want to transfer student activites business records to the University accounting system, while student leaders claim they should control these funds.

The SATF is derived from the $84 Student Tax paid yearly by every undergraduate. This fund supports the Student Government Association and more than 400 Registered Student Organizations.

The concern with this fund is its division into categories separately funding specific organizations as mandated by the UMass Board of Trustees, the highest governing body of the University.

The trustees' 1980 budget require the allocation of set funds to certain groups: $1.50 per student to the Distinguished Visitors Program; $3 to the Union Program Council; $10 to Balanced Parking and Transportation (the bus system); $9 to the area governments; $16 to the Student Activities Office and $5.70 to a deficit liquidation fund. This leaves $38.80 of the $84 SATF to be allocated by the Student Senate.

UPC, DVP, area govts.

The primary conflict surrounds the allocations for UPC, DVP and the area governments. The University is bound by contract to support the bus system. According to an April memorandum from Dean of Students William F. Field to then Associate Vice Chancellor Frederick Preston, the SAO is responsible for monitoring accounts, purchases, payroll and personnel of the student activities system.

"To carry out its fiscal and program responsibilities it must stand alone, be invulnerable to 'local politics' and open to continuous public scrutiny by all students," Field stated.

Defending a separate fee for area governments, Preston, in a memo to Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs Dennis L. Madson said, "I support a separate fee for this area because it creates the most opportune situation for the broadest cross-section of meaningful grassroots student participation in student-generated activities programming."

In an Oct. 18 memo to Madson the Student Government Association, SGA co-Presidents Rich LaVoice and Brian Burke, and Speaker David Barenberg stated their position on the SATF: "The Student Government Association will continue to address the fiscal problems we are now facing; and we will take all steps we feel necessary to improve the current system, including a re-allocation of priorities and funds.

"We will continue to be the sole initiator of any changes, modifications, improvements, etc. to the trust fund. The SGA is willing and grateful to work with any individuals whose experience may facilitate this process as long as those individuals work within the parameters set by the SGA and are responsive to the needs of the organization."

Power Play

LaVoice said he also thinks the problem reflects a much larger issue. "They're making a power play for the system," he said, referring to the administration. "It's a basic conflict on who's going to set the policy. Students have to set policy for students. The SGA has always set policy," and cited the "Wellman Document," – the trustees' statement on Universtiy government prepared by university ombudsman Robert Wellman, as the basis for his contention.

The Wellman Document, which defines University governance policy states "Students will have the primary responsibility for services and activities which are designed primarily to serve students or those which are financed by the students."

While granting this authority to the students the statement also reserves final authority for the trustees. "The board, while retaining it's ultimate legal authority in governing the university, recognizes that the faculty, the students, and other groups within the university have the right, reponsibility, and the priviledge of advising on policies affecting the university."

Madson denies LaVoice's contention of a power struggle. "We have no interest in that, just a fair value for the dollar. I'll defend and maintain that students can and should have a voice in policy formation, but not a total voice. This is state money, collected by the university and we are obligated to ad-

Speakers give opinions on country's economy

By VICTORIA JONES

Three opposing views of the United States' present economic condition were discussed last night in Mahar auditorium, where the Economics Department sponsored the event "Fifty years after the Great Crash – What Next?"

The "Teach-In," as Economics Prof. Leonard Rapping termed the evening, was aimed at acknowledging the anniversary of the Great Depression, and to warn the audience of a possible recurrence.

Approximately 250 student body and faculty members heard Rapping, Prof. Michael Best and Electric Radio and Machine union worker John Chase discuss the reasons behind the nation's present economic distress.

Rapping cited as major causes: "Obviously inflation, massive redistribution of wealth (especially to the oil companies), and the facts that the quality of merchandise is falling, productivity is stagnated, and ethnic and racial conflicts are emerging."

Proposition "2½ is equivalent to beating up old ladies and crippled people to save $75 on yearly property taxes," he said.

Rapping encouraged the audience to be watchful of the "divide and conquer syndrome," in which monopoly corporations control America. He also warned against "the massive flow of illegal immigrants," and a "fairy tale military organization that cannot deal with reality."

Best's speech concentrated on the effects of such unemployment and inflation. He commented on the causes, calling the country's economic situation, the "erosion of an illusion."

The working person's role was highlighted when Chase said, "The attitudes of working people have to change, and deal with extreme vulnerablitity. We have to overcome Communism and political independence to begin an upward spiral."

Georgia State Senator Julian Bond yesterday said his father, Horace Mann Bond, whose papers are a part of the University archives, would be disappointed at the rate of desegregation in this country.

"I'm sure he'd be disappointed at its relative slow pace. It may show the minorities have always had more faith in the constitution that it merited," he said.

Bond, on campus with his mother Julia Bond to dedicate the Horace Mann Bond Center for Equal Education said, "Racism is a tremendous problem in the United States. I think any man or woman who is 19 or 20-years-old and thinks they are free from

Boston walkouts halted

JERUSALEM — The Israeli Supreme Court, in a landmark decision that surprised the nation, ruled yesterdaythat the government had illegally seized private Arab land for a Jewish settlement and ordered that the hilltop outpost in the West Bank be abandoned.

The ruling, the first in which an Israeli court found a settlement in the occupied territories to be illegal, came just a day after Moshe Dayan resigned as foreign minister in a deepseated dispute over the settlement policies of Prime Minister Menachem Begin's government and its tough line on Palestinian autonomy.

The developments dealt a one-two punch to Begin's ruling coalition, and hopeful speculation raced through Arab capitals Monday that they might foreshadow major changes in Israel.

The five-judge Supreme Court ordered that the settlement at Elon Moreh, near the Arab-populated town of Nablus in the West Bank of the Jordan River, be dismantled within 30 days.

The 50 or so ultra-nationalists who have settled there indicated Monday they would resist efforts to remove them.

Israel: land seizure illegal

BOSTON(AP)— Authorities instituted their "get tough" policy at Boston's racially tense schools yesterday, stationing police to prevent the walkouts that burst into violence last week.

One brief scuffle between two dozen black and white students at Charlestown High School was the only trouble reported at the city's desegregated high schools, the scene of daily walkouts and fights last week.

Fuel aid comes to vote

BOSTON(AP)— The House Ways and Means Committee yesterday approved a $25 million measure to help the poor pay their fuel bills this winter, and the measure will go to the House floor Wednesday, Ways and Means Chairman John J. Finnegan said.

The Senate, meanwhile, approved an amendment to a bill reorganizing the state Energy Office. The amendment would provide $20 million to help the poor pay their fuel bills.

Finnegan said in an interview that $10 million in the House bill represents "up front money" — money the state will make available now but which will be paid back by the federal government once Congress approves this year's appropriation for the Crisis Intervention Program.

Exxon net up 118% during summer crisis

By MARK POTTS
Associated Press

NEW YORK — Exxon Corp., the world's largest oil company, said yesterday its profits were up 118 percent for the third quarter, a time when many Americans were waiting in gas lines and worrying about the price and supply of heating oil.

This year's third-quarter profits were the biggest in Exxon's histoory and among the most ever earned in a quarter by a U.S. company. Exxon's sales in the quarter rose to $20.65 billion from $15.9 billion.

"It was a good quarter," Ulysses J. LaGrange, the company's comptroller, said of the $1.14 billion profit. He said, however, that most of the company's profits were not reaped at the expense of American motorists and homeowners but from big increases in earnings from the company's overseas operations.

"The big story is still overseas," LaGrange said in a telephone interview. "The governments there are recognizing this tight supply situation and they're willing to let their consumers pay more to get their share of the world oil supply. ... In the U.S. we haven't even been able to pass all our costs through."

Exxon, the nation's second largest industrial firm, said the profit of $1.14 billion came to $2.60 per share of common stock. That compared with $525 million, or $1.18 per share, in same period of 1978.

LaGrange said the size of the difference between this year's third quarter and last year's was slightly misleading because last year's third quarter results were the poorest for the firm in five years.

In the nine months ended Sept. 30, Exxon's profits were $2.93 billion, or $6.64 a share, up 53 percent from the $1.91 billion, or $4.28 a share, Exxon reported in the same period in 1978. Sales for the nine months rose to $59.1 billion from $46.7 billion.

Exxon was the second big oil company to release earnings for the July-September period. Standard Oil Co. of Indiana said Friday its profits rose 49 percent in the quarter from the 1978 figures. Other large oil firms are expected to announce similarly hefty increases in profits in the next few days.

Govt. charges discrimination in Sears' hiring

By OWEN ULLMANN
AP Labor Writer

WASHINGTON — The federal government took Sears Roebuck & Co. to court in five cities yesterday on charges that the world's largest retailer practiced illegal job discrimination against women and minorities across the United States.

A nationwide suit filed in federal court in Chicago accused Sears of job discrimination against women in the 48 contiguous states in violation of the Civil Rights and Equal Pay acts.

Four other suits filed simultaneously in New York City; Atlanta; Montgomery, Ala.; and Memphis, Tenn., charged the retailer with discriminating against minorities in hiring at seven facilities in those four areas.

The suits, brought by the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, are among the largest employment discrimination cases ever launched by the government and likely will be the biggest job bias suit to be fought in court.

Sears is one of the nation's largest employers, with a workforce of 400,000 in all 50 states, the District of Columbia and Puerto Rico. The company has 850 retail stores and nearly 3,000 other selling locations, such as catalog centers.

Court action has been expected since January, when the commission broke off 14 months of negotiations with Sears on an out-of-court settlement, charging the discussions were fruitless.

After the negotiatons broke off, Sears filed a novel suit against the EEOC and nine other federal agencies in an attempt to hold the government responsible for job discrimination in the workforce.

The suit charged that federal policies, such as veterans preference laws, created a workforce that is dominated by white males, thus preventing employers from providing equal job opportunities to women and minorities.

Student dorm lease explained

By NORM WHITEHURST
Collegian Staff

A University housing contract -- a lease for UMass dormitory residents -- will be explained to newly-elected area residential officers tonight to acquaint them with its purposes.

The mandatory contract, developed last December by Vice Chancellor Dennis L. Madson, Housing Office representatives and student officers, was approved by the UMass Board of Trustees last spring.

"The purpose of the Housing Contract is to reclaim and guarantee students' rights in the dormitories," said a spokesman for the Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy.

"When living in high density areas, certain procedures are needed to modify behavior. This is one reason why I'm totally for it," said Robert Campbell, Residential Resource and Management director.

The contract also includes guidelines for space assignment, duration of occupacy and housing fees.

"Dorms are fast becoming run-down hotels," said Carroll McGrath of the SCERA Residential Team. "The Housing Contract is finally giving students a voice and a form of action which will make dorms more like homes and give students the responsibility of them."

The contract was taken to the United States Student Conference this summer, where it was seen by representatives of student government from over 350 colleges.

"The contact really impressed them," McGrath said.

Two committees are currently being formed to review the contract yearly and revise it as necessary.

The Residential Committee consists of Laura Owens and Ann O'Connor from the Southwest Residential Area, Mike Silverman of Orchard Hill Residential Area, and Linda Elias, from the Northeast Residential Area. Central and Sylvan Residential Areas will appoint representatives shortly. Administrators include John Findley, Assistant Director of Residential Resource Management, and Joseph Battista, area director of Orchard Hill and Central. Madson will appoint four more members soon.

The Residential Appeals Committee will deal with student grievances concerning the contract. Members from each residential area will be appointed some time this week to work with the adminstration to insure student rights are upheld.

Campbell said the contract is a bit "clumsy," but this is to be expected for a new contract.

"The reason that the contract was designed," said Brian Harvey of the Student Affairs Office, "was to make it clear who does what—the administration's and the student's responsibilities."

Student opinion on the contract varied and many were unsure about what it was.

"The Housing Contract is a good idea, but the one we have is too vague and doesn't really outline students' rights and repsonsibilities," said Harry Brod, an exchange student from Oregon State and a Southwest resident.

"When UMass uses Hamlin as a hotel over the summer and our pool tables and ping-pong tables are ruined, this can hardly be judged fair with respect to the returning students," said Jim Lang, President of Hamlin Dormitory.

An anonymous student from Sylvan said he thought the contract was needed but, "should be more strict than it is now."

If a student refuses to sign the contract, his housing assignment will be cancelled and freshmen or sophomores required to live on campus, may be withdrawn from the University, Campbell said.

"Students who didn't sign the cards for this semester are now being caught up with," Campbell said. "Next semester the housing arrangement will be cancelled immediately if they refuse to sign."

Cheering: great sport on sidelines

By PAUL BANKS
Collegian Staff

Every Saturday at Alumni Stadium the UMass cheerleaders can be found on the sidelines cheering on the Minutemen.

The co-captains of the team are seniors Patti Sheerin and Nancy Maki. The team consists of 16 people, eight men and eight women.

Tryouts for this years team were held last spring. About 50 women competed, said Sean Kimball, a junior and a cheerleader. The competition judges are former cheerleaders Richard James of the Dance Department, and Roy Johnson a UMass gymnastics coach.

"I love the school and cheering is a great way to show it. I love the sport of cheerleading," Maki said. Junior Jennifer Taub said she is concerned with the attitudes some students show toward cheering.

"It really bothers me that everyone thinks cheerleaders have to be pretty. They are there to get the crowd involved, and to represent the school," she said.

Senior Victor Woolridge said he likes cheering because he gets to watch the football season from a different perspective. "The crowds this year are better and that makes me feel good. The road trips are really great. We really enjoyed our first game with Villanova. It was a good time."

Men, women differ in abortion survey

By KAREN LORD

50 percent women and 36 percent men favor abortion, according to a recent Collegian survey of 50 randomly-selected UMass students.

45 percent of the men said they were opposed to abortion, while one percent were undecided and 18 percent said they felt it is up to women. 35 percent of the women said they were opposed to abortion. 14 percent were undecided and one percent said it is up to the woman.

Only 13 percent of those surveyed claimed their opinions were for religious reasons. According to the general consensus, legalization with definite restrictions, would be a step in the right direction. Legalized abortion "could prove helpful in insuring safety and perhaps more humane approaches in abortion procedures," one student said.

"If abortion is made legal, there should be a socialized funding made possible for those who cannot afford high costs of birth," said another interviewee.

Reginald Mills, a senior majoring in Plant Pathology, said he is for abortion. "It is the right of a woman to decide what to do with her body," he said. He also believes the government should pay for an abortion if the woman's life is endangered by her pregnancy.

Medler Reubenbarrington, a graduate said "In Tora, Jewish women cannot use birth control. There are only certain cases when a woman could be excused and use birth control, but in general, birth control is forbidden." Thus, according to Reubenbarrington, for Jewish women, there is no choice.

Maureen Howlett, a senior majoring in Communication Studies, said she is against abortion because, "it is destroying life." She also said, "I feel everyone has the right to decide, but I am against it (abortion)."

"It's not my decision. I'm not the one who has to go through pregnancy," said sophomore botany major Pat Kahilo.

Pauline Bedard, a sophomore German major said she is against abortion. "From the moment of conception the fetus is a human life, and no one has the right to say who should and should not live. There are too many women today that can not have children, and it is unfair that they do not have the choice of adopting because women are using abortion as a method of birth control," she said. She said she also believes abortion should be illegal with no exceptions. "No matter what the circumstances were, it is still a human life," she said.

"It is a woman's right to terminate her own pregnancy, but there should be a line drawn on when the baby inside is considered a human life," said junior political science major Mike Barry.

Few of the students questioned took a definite stand on abortion. Many felt that each individual case should be dealt with separately.

Reproductive rights action planned

Three Reproductive Rights Week activities will take place today at UMass. "The New Right and the Attack on Reproductive Rights," a discussion, is scheduled for 2:30 p.m. in Campus Center 903. "Women, the State and Reproductive Rights," a workshop led by Chris DiStefano of the Socialist Feminist Collective, will be held at 4 p.m. in Campus Center 803.

At 8 p.m., feminist singers and songwriters, Betsy Rose and Cathy Winter will give a free concert in the Student Union Ballroom.

Elks donate special phone

By SEAN HARVEY
Collegian Staff

The Amherst Board of Selectmen last night accepted from Elks Lodge No. 997 a gift of equipment enabling deaf persons to telephone the Fire Department and report emergencies.

"To my knowledge we are the only emergency receiving center in the state which can receive calls from the deaf," Fire Chief Joh. T. Doherty said.

The gift will enable deaf persons to dial the number DEAF, place the phone is a special cradle and then use an electronic keyboard to type out the information. The lodge is paying for the equipment and installation charges, as well as the monthly phone bill.

The equipment, which will cost approximately $1,200 to $1,400, will be located in the Fire Department Dispatch Center in the center of Amherst.

The selectmen proclaimed October 12 through 18 "Emergency Medical Safety Week" to recognize Fire Department emergency medical technicians, Amherst medical associates, first responders to accidents and the UMass infirmary.

The selectmen supported hiring of a new Housing Clerk with Comprehensive Employment and Training Act monies to fill the vacant post.

"We believe another person should be recruited for this position," said Jonathan Hanke, Chairman of the Landlords Tenants and Relations Committee. The position pays $6,500 a year.

The Selectmen voted for the Town Manager to explore the legality of posting "No right-turn-on-red" signs at certain intersections in the town. Presently, there are no right turns on red in Amherst. The selectmen agreed that drivers unfamiliar with the area, especially out-of-state [illegible] might assume that all intersections were right-on-red.

"Amherst is not right-on-red," explained Selectman Diana Romer, "because we are a small town that is heavily congested with traffic at a lot of intersections."

Bond.

Bond, a distinguished black scholar and educator committed his life to promoting the right to equal education for every child.

According to Fantini, the acquisition of the Bond papers, along with the W.E.B. DuBois papers, form an important set of resources, not only for the University, but for the nation and the rest of the world as well.

The Bond papers, comparable in size with the DuBois papers, already housed at the UMass Library, arrived several weeks ago. They measure 150 feet and include a half century of research on black education, family papers, and correspondence, family geneology and letters to DuBois.

"The existence of both papers tend to the mutual enhancement of each other," said John Kendall, a Library representative.

"There is no more fitting a companion of DUBois than the acquiring of the Bond papers," Koffler said.

Weinberg called the Bond papers "one of the most significant collections on school desegregation in the world."

"Its a great honor to head up the center and have it bear the name of Horace Mann Bond," he said.

"The center will not only be for study and research, but will also serve as a national clearinghouse on desegregation and every factor on inequality and education of minority children worldwide," Weinberg said.

The center will store information on racial and other social factors that deter the achievement of first rate education for all students.

'EXCUSE ME — COULD YOU DIRECT ME TO THE CRISIS?'

Palestinians prefer peace

Tarek Elnabli

Ed. note—This is the last of a two-part series.

The Middle East debate always returns to the question of Israel's right to exist. For Jews, it is unfortunate to see that a lack of clarity or equivocation on this point is perceived as a basic lack of affirmation for their peoplehood, an attitude which led to one holocaust and could lead to another.

Even a mere dialogue with the PLO is seen as a betrayal to the Jewish people and Israel. An example of which is the Andrew Young's visit to the PLO resulting in his resignation and the visit of Reverend Jesse Jackson with the PLO resulting in the refusal of a meeting with Mr. Begin by Mr. Begin himself on the grounds that talks took place with a Palestinian "terrorist" organization.

This is what I call non-cooperation on the part of Israel, especially at such a time when the goal for peace is so vital for both parties, again, it is unfortunate.

Palestinians, on the other hand, resent being forced to begin and end all discussion at this point, since Israel does in fact exist while Palestinian rights, much less any hope of a state, are crushed by Israeli policies.

Further, it must be understood that many feel that granting Israel its legitimacy in exchange for nothing, which is essentially what Israel demands, would require that past injustices done to the Palestinians be ignored in the process of establishing present relations and that is impossible to do or even give thought to.

It can therefore be understood and declared uneven and more—over against—human rights. And in the name of its right to securely exist like any other nation, Israel continues to deny land livelihood, basic rights and political self-determination to the Palestinians who have been refugees from their home land for decades.

Israel does exist in the Middle East among many Arab nations and Egypt. The question, however, is how a political and economic relationship between the two can be built which mutually insures equality, livelihood and self-determination.

This could take various political forms. Our hope is for peace which would not rest on competing and antagonistic nationalisms but on the possiblity for Jew and Palestinian to coexist.

Concretely, this means that Israel's existance as a self-defined state must be accompanied by statehood for the Palestinian people. It is that simple for a true peace to happen in the Middle East. Even though this may not seem a very desirable, as some may oppose, we have to see it as a first step toward injustice and coexistance.

Essentially the Palestinians are asking for restitution. Restitution does not require that history be turned back. But it does require very concrete acts of conciliation. The point is that asking for restitution should not be construed as the denial of a secure life for the Jewish people.

Unfortunately, what is necessary for peace is far from the realm of present diplomatic realities. Israeli policy remains intrasigently opposed to any accomodation of the Palestinians. I would like to see, as much as every one in this world, that there is movement toward flexibility on the Israeli side on the issue of coexistance.

The U.S. plays, as we all know, a very crucial part in this issue. It is reality that I am trying to face. Therefore, I ask you to notice that U.S. policy is already timid and uncertain and likely to become more paralyzed with the intrusion of electoral politics (votes) in 1980. Therefore for peace in that part of the world, the main actors; i.e., Israel and the rest of its neighbors, are the ones that must depend on each other for their "common" cause.

It must be clearly understood that the fears and ongoing suffering of the Palestinian people is in fact an unfortunate reality.

We, you and I, are people of peace. Let us express our need for the abolition of hardship in this process of negotiations, especially on those who seem not to realize the question of human rights in their politics and policies. On the same token let us aid the Palestinian people to go back to their home land in Palestine.

Even though we must realize that the prospects of peace depend both on a continuing psychological and spiritual transformation of both people; that the support of the American public to the Palestinian people may be the birth of a new era of Peace in the Middle East.

Ms. Devlin lived up to her name

Elved Owens

I don't know how many people who attended what turned out to be Mrs. McCallisky's fund-raiser last Wednesday felt as I did, that whilst I could disagree with much that she said, it is understandable that she should feel the way she does. There is little doubt that up to 1968 the Protestant majority in Northern Ireland did abuse its power. In many other parts of Britain the electoral security of ruling regional parties has led, and does lead, to corruption; only in Northern Ireland has the corruption expressed itself in the persecution of a distinctive minority, and of course, only there has it had a long history of savage sectarian hatred in which to indulge. If a working-class Catholic broods in Belfast or Derry feels no great trust in the British or the Protestants, no-one should be surprised. And as depressing as such places continue to be because of the troubles, he knows that until he started marching, bombing and shooting, few outside Ireland, on the Right or the Left, knew or cared about his plight.

Which is why, ten years on, Mrs. McCallisky is touring America and passing the hat round, barely able to conceal her impatience with tentative questions about all the deliberate slaughter and suffering back home. 'Don't talk to me about suffering,' is her stance as she recounts all the injustices which the Irish Catholics have endured. The license of suffering has a ghastly logic about it; 'Don't talk to me about suffering,' is a potent motto that would carry conviction for many people: The Jew, the Palistinian, the black African, the Pole, the Hungarian, the Czech, the Kurd, and, indeed, for the British soldier who has watched his friends blown to pieces and sworn his vengeance. Who wants to weigh the suffering, or challenge with arguments, someone who has seen their kin-blood flow?

But can anyone afford to abandon those arguments, or afford to concede that morality is just an indulgent luxury of the seminar room or the quiet suburb? Because that is the concession which Mrs. McCallisky is resigned to; on her capital of suffering I imagine that she draws the following transactions: Have the Irish been maltreated? Yes. Did anyone else care? Not a soul. Was there any way that they could redress their grievances without killing? No. Therefore is killing right? No more wrong than an ignored grievance. And what is so depressing is that the million Protestants in Northern Ireland are just as capable of drawing the same transactions. Ten years of troubles have given everyone cause for vengeance.

Whatever the bombers and gunmen call themselves, there are no Freedom Fighters in Ireland; there are fighters. Violence is a means of publicizing despair; it is not guaranteed to bring solution, much less freedom. If the British troops leave, there will be bloodshed; the protestants will arm themselves. And I wish that I could share Mrs. McCalisky's optimistic view that should British troops pull out, the Protestants will not arm themselves and fight. She says that the Protestants rely on the 16,000 rifles of the British Army, and with these gone, they would have few arms left.

Because no single group has a monopoly of bitterness, and because every political group has long memory, there will be no peace in Ireland. And the number of futile deaths on all sides will mount. When Mrs. McCallisky says 'Don't talk to me about suffering' it is hard, given the reality of original grievances, to reply. But by the same token, given the reality of bodies blown to pieces, it is not easy to give money to McCallisky knowing that it might pay for someone's death. The identity of the victim is irrelevant unless you want to play God.

I did not give; sanitized talk of 'legitimate targets' means nothing to me, and only if I could be willing to pull the trigger myself and watch somenone die (because that is what it might ultimately mean) would I have been able to do otherwise. What Mrs. McCallisky would regard as my contemptible and serviceable liberal conscience has an aversion to killing; and it is a conscience I have to live with. I trust that those whose liberal consciences caused them to give, sleep soundly with theirs.

Letters

'New morality' proposed for...

To the Editor:

I would like to respond to Lisa Capone's article concerning the pope. She described the Pope's view of a Catholic Woman's life. She failed to describe her own view which I will do for her.

A woman of the "new morality" would of course, start sex education early, probably in the fourth grade just in case she reaches puberty early. Wanting to try out what she has learned in class she sleeps with a classmate. But since they don't get to contraception until grade five, she gets pregnant.

Naturally she would like to kill the child but neither she nor her eleven year old boyfriend has a job yet. By the time she's twelve (After learning about contraception and sleeping around) she becomes bored with heterosexual relationships and becomes a lesbian. She wouldn't have to worry about her right to divorce because who would want to marry a used woman with an illegitimate child and a female lover? But, don't forget, morality isn't important as long as you "enjoy" yourself.

Cops take in 24 persons

By KAREN LIBUCHA
Collegian Staff

This past Homecoming weekend was a "busy one," said UMass police, who took in a total of 24 persons -- 16 arrests and 8 protective custodies.

UMass student James R. Engels, 19, was charged with larceny under $100; UMass student Douglas H. Morris, 19, with breaking and entering; and Richard S. Gordon, 27, of Amherst and Mansfield Stuckey, Jr., 26, of Holyoke were charged with default on warrants.

Arrested for assault and battery were Joseph Leahy, 20, and Michael Omer, 19, of Holyoke, and arrested for driving while intoxicated was UMass student Dean D. Pecevich, 18.

Antonio DePina of New Bedford was arrested for leaving the scene of an accident, operating a stolen vehicle and attaching a license plate illegally.

In addition, a Fine Arts Center van was reported vandalized at 12:50 a.m. Saturday with a minimum estimate of $1,000 worth of damages, police said. The van was parked on the ramp on the north side of the FAC when someone, police speculated, released the brake, "evidently to get it to go into the pond." Instead, the van smashed into a tree and was "pretty close to being totalled," they said.

A breaking and entering, and a larceny of unkown value in Gorman dormitory in the Central Residential Area was reported at 3:21 a.m. Saturday. Items stolen included a portable TV, stereo receiver, turntable and possibly some cash, police said.

Jewish women aim to explore heritage

By MARCIA MURPHY
Collegian Staff

"In Celebration of Jewish Women" begun Sunday at UMass and running through Oct. 31, is aimed "to make people in general more aware of the heritage of Jewish women," said Marian Hait of B'nai B'rith Hillel, a Jewish campus group.

"We want to bring Jewish women together and have them explore their feelings through a variety of themes, including personal stories, biographies, dance and culture," Hait said.

"We'd like to explore how Jewish women see themselves in relation to non-Jewish women also," she said.

The program which is free of charge, is sponsored by Hillel, Everywomen's Center, Southwest Women's Center, Resources Judaica and the Distinguished Visitors Program.

Committees have been planning the week since the summer, Hait said. Presentations will include speakers, discussions, film, dance and an evening of storytelling and mime, Hait said:

"Women in Israel", a discussion with Rachel Hillel and Hagit Borer, will be held tonight at 7:30 p.m. in Campus Center room 903. The talk will be followed by Women's Israeli Folkdancing led by Elise Brenner in the Commonwealth Room, Student Union Building.

"Jewish and Non-Jewish Women: A View of Ourselves and Others," a discussion with Professor of Anthropology Carol Holzberg and feminist therapist Miriam Greenspan, will be held Thursday at 7:30 p.m. in Campus Center 903.

"Portraits of Biblical Women," a solo performance by Rabbi Lynn Gottlieb, will take place Oct. 28 at 8 p.m. in the Campus Center Auditorium. Gottlieb is a story teller and mime, who is a rabbi for the deaf in New York City, and founder of the Bat Kol Players.

There will be a meeting of the Lesbian's Union tonight at 6 p.m. in Campus Center 920 to discuss the organizational structure of the group. A mediator will be present, and all interested women are urged to attend.

HEW grants UMass funds for minorities

Dept. of Health, Education and Welfare Secretary Patricia Roberts Harris announced yesterday the award of nearly $8 million to 108 colleges and universities to assist minority and women students in graduate and professional study.

UMass—Amherst received 12 fellowships and $93,600 in grants for the 1979-80 Academic year, according to a HEW press release.

"Minorities and women traditionally have been underrepresented in graduate and professional fields," Harris said. "These grants will help substantially to alleviate the imbalance."

Protest against racism planned

There will be a People's Rally to protest alledged racist police action and violence against women and Third World people Saturday at 2 p.m. on the Amherst Center Common. The Amherst Defense Committee said the rally is planned due to community concern and outrage over assault against Third World people. For information, contact Suman Bohm at Everywomen's Center, 5-0883.

Mental health group to present slide-show

On Our Own, a non-profit, self-help group serving mental health consumers in Western Massachusetts, will present a slide-show entitled DUKKHA, which makes a statement about human suffering and institutionalism.

The show will be presented on Thursday from 7 to 9 p.m. at the Springfield Community Action Auditorium, 721 State St., Springfield and on October 30 at 3 p.m. in the Pleasant St. Theatre, 27 Pleasant St., Northampton.

A special presentation will also be on October 30 at 7 p.m. in the Iron Horse Cafe, 20 Centre St., Northampton. Musical entertainment will be provided by Elliot Sharpe. The public is invited.

Lecture to focus on Semite problems

Author and lecturer Rafael Patai will be speaking in Campus Center 165 at 4 p.m. Wednesday on the subject of "The Jews — the link between East and West."

Patai, described by Paul Mankin, chair of the Western European Studies department as "an important contributor to the difficult problem of understanding various problems of the Semites."

Author of The Arab Mind and The Jewish Mind, Patai is a cultural anthropologist of Hungarian origin who studied in Palestine in the 1930's and came to the United States after the formation of the State of Israel.

Energy group will meet at AC

There will be an organizational meeting of the Amherst Energy Coalition tonight at 7:30 in 207 Converse Hall at Amherst College.

Members of the AEC will be selling apples on the Campus Center Concourse today to raise money for the "Take it to Wall Street" demonstration scheduled for Oct. 28-29.

Anyone interested in demonstration tickets should contact Malcolm Quint at 584-7984.

Correction

Members of the Iranian Muslim Student Association said yesterday that literature they distributed at a table on the Campus Center Concourse was not anti-zionist as identified in a headline story in the Oct. 16 issue of the Collegian.

The story focused on a pamphlet the group was distributing called "Masters of the Media," in which an article was reprinted from an unidentified source that cited examples of Jewish involvement in the media.

this problem is living in an enormous dream world."

Bond, a member of the Southern Non-Violent Co-ordinating Committee during the 1960's, also said at a news conference black students are "completely separate from the world about them; they are extremely career oriented." He said they are separate from the "political process" in this country, and cited 18 to 25-year-olds as having the poorest voting record of American blacks.

Bond also said he recognizes the need for all students to study black history. He said he supports Black Studies as a concentration, but sees the need for such programs in the everyday curriculum. "Although there isn't black geology, I think students should know about black geologists," he said.

On the upcoming 1980 presidential election, Bond said, "There's a reservoir of good feeling among American black people" towards President Carter.

"I'm pretty sure Senator (Edward) Kennedy is going to run," he said. "I would hate, however, to see black Americans jump into Kennedy's arms the way they jumped into President Carter's."

Bond said there is the tendency among blacks in America to associate Edward Kennedy with his brothers. He said blacks would "cast the right vote for the wrong reason."

Julia Bond said the Bond papers were donated to the University because Meyer Weinberg, a School of Education professor associated with Bond, requested they be added to the University's archives. "No one had really made a practical move to get them together," before Weinberg contacted her, she said.

Mrs. Bond said she was pleased the center was named after her husband. Her husband, she said, was named after Horace Mann, a white educator instrumental in promoting public education in Massachusetts.

their routines and pyramids. Partners practice stunts until they are mastered. "If there is something my partner and I can't do, we just keep on trying until we are confident," said junior Steve Rosenfeld.

The cheerleaders also cheer together during the basketball season. They are exploring the possibility of entering a competition involving eight eastern universities at Duquesne University, Sheerin said.

★ SGA

ministrate these monies."

He said the trustees have the ultimate authority in policy making and described the disagreement as "a different kind of interpretation of responsibility."

Madson explained that since the SGA is part of the University, it is the University's responsibility to administer the funds. He offered as a possible solution the incorporation of the SGA as a separate entity from the university. Although he said this has been successfully done at some schools, namely the University of California, it would be some time before it could be accomplished at UMass.

Policy-setting

David Barenberg echoed LaVoice's concerns. "The major battle is who sets policy," he said, adding that the administration is attempting to "dilute the membership and decentralize student government."

Barenberg said the planned switchover of student activities to the University accounting system would severely limit student groups. "There would be no deficit spending," he said, "groups could not spend in anticipation of revenue—the co-ops could not buy."

He explained that under the present system the senate can allow groups to deficit spend to finance money making activities.

"We want to go on line with the University computer system," Barenberg said. "The issue is not being on University accounting; the issue is the needs of the system. There's more options than going to university accounting."

He expressed concern over being forced to account to the university for expenditures. "We don't want the adminstration to say how and where we spend our money. We don't want them to say that's not a legitimate expenditure. We don't want them to make political determinations by telling us we can't hire a bus to go to Boston to protest the drinking age or anything else."

Field said the new system would require student groups to operate through the Office of Procurement to make purchases. He said this office would insure University guidelines were being followed in purchasing, meeting University specifications and contracts when necessary. He said students would have to justify purchases to the office, and explain why specific items were being ordered. This would not limit student spending, he said, but would set up a control function to monitor purchases by students.

SGA—more public?

Field said the switch to the university accounting system would make the dealings of the SGA "more public." He said the present system does not provide for checking, even by students, on how much money exists in the various accounts. Now, he said, financial statements are weeks behind. The University accounting system would allow for instant access to the records. He said this would help prevent the abuses of the system by student leaders.

LaVoice said University accounting "may be a good way to go, but it needs study," He said the change should be done carefully to insure the quality of the system. "We want to go into a crack accounting system," he said, "but we want to make sure this is the best thing." A task force is being organized by him to study the situation, he said.

Madson also said he is assembling a task force to study the change. The "Transition Review Team" will be comprised of three students: Burke, Treasurer William Fitzgerald, and the senate Budgets Committee chairperson. Also on the team will be acting Director of Student activities O.C. Bobby Daniels, representatives from the RSO business office, campus comptroller, procurement office, the student affairs budget coordinator and the student services director.

In a memorandum to the members of the team last Thursday, Madson said the purpose of the team was "to monitor the relationship between the accounting office and the users of the RSO system. The team will have the ability to recommend deviations from campus policy where such modifications would expedite matters that otherwise would place an unneccesary burden on the managers of the Student Activites Trust Fund."

Madson said the SATF allocations are commitments which must be kept. He said they could be changed next year and "minor changes" could be accepted in this year's budget. The amount of flexibility, he said "depends on how these numbers are interpreted."

"He is concerned with meeting the requirements for deficit liquidation," he said. The trustees, in their budget summary, require that the deficit be liquidated by the 1981 fiscal year, with a fund of $100,000 per year set aside for this purpose.

Bootwomen bomb Brown

By ROB EMMONS
Collegian Staff

While you're cheering on the likes of Mike Mc Evilly and Cliff Pedrow, the women's soccer team has garnered a nifty 7-1-1 record, most recently collecting a win over Brown University.

In besting the Brown squad 3-0, UMass avenged last year's tie decision with the Bruins, which marred an otherwise perfect record. The victory on Saturday made for an exciting conclusion to a four game homestand.

It appeared at first as if the Minutewomen would fashion the customary decimation, scoring thrice and firing 19 shots to Brown's 5 in the first half. The final stanza was no cake-walk, however, as a tight defensive battle developed. This time Brown outshot UMass, 14-12, and, frustrated by their deficit, began to grow physical.

The Minutewomen are not easily intimidated, though, and the UMass backfield proved equal to the task. Coach Arnie Morse cited the performances of defender Sammut, Lapointe, Gaw, and Hourihan, while goalie Tuller was called upon to make at least one brilliant stop.

That UMass outscored the opponents 22-1 on the homestand is testimony to the defense's constant improvement.

Listen to tonight's special edition of WMUA's (91.1 FM) Sports Cafe program from 6-7:00 with hosts Jim Spellos and Jim Mullins. Also on tonight will be the Collegian Sports Editors Mark Marchand and Steve Zack. Call in at 545-2876.

Ski Club ready for '79

By ROXANNE EDWARDS and KEN SILVERSTEIN
Special to the Collegian

The summer is barely over and the leaves have just begun to fall, yet the UMass Ski Club is already in full swing. The club is anticipating another great season and has elected its executive board members. The board is headed by Brad Cohen and Jim Chambers as co-vice-presidents, Roxanne Edwards and Mark Coyle as co-secretaries, and Ken Silverstein and Steve Glaser as treasurers. This board plans and organizes all of the ski club events.

Presently, the Ski Club is in the midst of its annual membership drive. It is hoping to retain its title of the largest student organization on campus, aiming for a total membership of over 800.

The club's major fund raiser is its annual Ski Sale, which will be held Nov. 14-17 in the S.U.B. The sale will contain over $500,000 worth of new and used ski equipement, including clothing and accessories. A large number of volunteers are needed to staff the sale, and committees are being presently formed.

Throughout the year the ski club runs various trips. During the winter recess the club sponsors a Ski and Party Week that runs from Jan. 20-25. Last year the club took 300 skiers to the fun-filled week in Sugarbush Valley, Vt. and is hoping to take 400 this year. The club also provides skiers with day trips weekly throughout the spring semester.

However, according to UMass coach Elaine Marasco, the team has been adjusting to their problems, that the net play has improved, and that UMass' pasisng, "errant" at first, is helping the team to stay in every match.

After Bridgeport/Sacred Heart, UMass goes down the road to Mount Holyoke College; both varsity and JV's will play. These matches are helping UMass to prepare for this Saturday's opponents, Barrington and highly-ranked Southern Connecticut. This tri-match will take place in NOPE gym; it will be the first home match for UMass since September 25, when they swept Boston College.

YOU'RE BEING ROBBED!

Dear Tenant.

Join us in the fight to get back your security deposit. The Umass Off Campus Housing Office, The UMass Legal Services Office and the Consumer Action Center have formed a Security Deposit Task Force in order to furnish the State Attorney General's office with information which could lead to an investigation of landlords for improperly withholding/deducting monies from your security deposit for alleged repairs, damages and/or cleaning, rather than the landlord evaluating each unit separately, and charging tenants as such. We have included some examples of pre-standardized deductions at the right.

Each of us in our separate agencies have been compiling complaints from tenants against former landlords and we now think it is time to hear from others. Please fill out the questionnaire and mail it back to us by November 1, 1979. You can also drop the questionnaire off in person at any of the appropriate agencies cooperating in this effort. If you have any questions contact us by telephone.

Insuring the safe return of your security deposit monies is a priority for us. Help us to do something about it. Please fill out the questionnaire at the following locations:

Sandro Vitiello: just a foot away from an NFL career

By FRANK PAPSADORE
Collegian Staff

UMass may have another one of its graduates hit the big times in professional sports. In the footsteps of people like Gred Landry, Mike Flanagan, and Dr. Julius Erving, comes a new breed of athletic hero, Sandro Vitiello.

Vitiello has been the Minutemen place kicker for two years. A quiet, reserved kind of person off the field, on the field his power and accuracy rank him with the top placekickers in the country and give him as good a chance as anybody to make it in professional sports.

Vitiello's older brother Alberto got Sandro started at placekicking. Albert Vitiello was a placekicker at Penn State in the early 1970's.

"I helped my brother practice," Vitiello said sitting on the edge of his couch bouncing a soccer ball. "You know, I shagged balls for him and stuff. After a while I started kicking myself. Alberto kicked a 60-yarder in a game in junior college. I haven't matched that yet, but I hope I will someday."

Sandro Vitiello has kicked some 60-65 yarders during practice, "But only with the wind," he added with a laugh.

The 21-year-old senior sports management major from East Meadow Long Island was kicking for Nassau Community College when UMass first contacted him.

"We were playing a game in Virginia when UMass' Billy Maxwell saw me," said Vitiello. "He told me that they would get in touch with me again, and sure enough, coach MacPherson talked to me later."

Villanova had also contacted Vitiello and forced him into a decision between the two schools.

"The football program is excellent here," said Vitiello. "The coaches make a big difference too. Bob Pickett is a tremendous coach. He's not the rah-rah type but he commands a lot of respect from his players. All in all, the best thing is that football at UMass has not lost the concept of having fun while playing the game."

"It's a little inhibiting though, not having a full time kicking coach," continued Vitiello, bouncing the soccer ball a little faster. "A coach like that can help you see things you're doing wrong that you think you're doing right. But again, all the good things that come out of the UMass program outweigh the bad by far."

"At the beginning of the year there were many doubts," said Vitiello, "But now we're just starting to realize how far we can really go. We keep getting better as the season progresses," claims Vitiello.

Vitiello plays a lot of soccer when he's off the football field. As a matter of fact, his roomate is a top UMass soccer player, Wayne Moran.

"Being a soccer player has helped me a lot, needless to say," said Vitiello. "It helps me to concentrate on kicking the ball because, after all, that's my job and I'm expected to do it."

The soccer training of learning to use both feet kicking the ball must have also contributed to a rare, if not totally unprecedented event in all of college football. One year ago, Vitiello hurt his left (kicking) foot in practice, before a game with the University of Rhode Island.

"I tried kicking with the left foot on Saturday before the game," smiled Vitiello, remembering the moment, "but it just hurt too much. So I figured to try to use my right foot. I'd done it before in practice just fooling around and it was worth a try."

"I missed my first attempt," remembered Vitiello. "And when I was called the second time I was nervous as hell. But I tried to block out everything in my mind and just concentrate on the ball, and it worked, twice."

I asked Vitiello what he thought UMass' chances are of winning the NCAA's Division 1-AA championship this year.

"Well Division 1-AA is good for us," said Vitiello. "It's just about our level of competition. Florida A and M is the team to beat again this year and now I think our team has the experience, the confidence, and the personnel to beat them."

"Coach Pickett emphasizes the fact of just taking one game at a time," continued Vitiello. "But it's hard not to realize that we've got a great shot to go all the way."

Since Vitiello is a senior, he must consider what he expects to do when he graduates.

"I hope that I can get a shot at pro football," said Vitiello, "I think I've got a pretty good chance. If I don't get picked up in the NFL draft, I'll at least try out at some camps. It's funny though, you never really know what the pro football teams are gonna do or who they're gonna want. I just hope I get a chance, that's all."

Spikers travel to Bridgeport

By MAUREEN SULLIVAN

As they open up the second half of the season, the women's volleyball team prepares not just for a successful record, but for regional action in mid-November.

Showing an 11-5 record for their efforts, including wins over Providence College, Boston College, and UConn, the Minutewomen get set for a Tuesday night tri-match against Bridgeport and Sacred Heart at Bridgeport.

The Minutewomen did not play either Bridgeport or Sacred Heart last year.

UMass has had trouble adjusting to a more individualized offense; their extensive road schedule caused UMass to cope with problems -- an inability to time blocks with the opposing offense, fading serves, etc.

Homecoming heroes

The action is not just on the field, said the hackneyed sports broadcaster-type, and if you saw the Minutemen play the Sheep of the University of Rhode Island last Saturday, you would have seen that most of the action was not on the field.

While the UMass gridders were running circles around the helpless Rhode Islanders, the mind tended to wander. It was Homecoming Day, or homecoming day, depending on how you look at it. The bald and polyester-clad alumni stood at attention faithfully while our beery Alma Mater was played. I wonder if this is the only university in the country where the alumni actually get booed.

A splendid job of blocking and tackling was turned in the fired-up contingent of campus police, who did an inspired job of recovering footballs that happened to fly out of Alumni Stadium, courtesy of Sandro Vitiello. One particular play, that deserves notice was the one turned in by Officer "J" midway through the fourth quarter when he made an unassisted tackle of a youth who tried to abscound with a $35 football.

However, the local lawmen completely misread the game plan of a 13-year old who made a beautiful catch of a Vitiello extra point and took off like a shotgun blast, ball in hand. The youth, pursued by three greenshirts and a Sgt. "X" vehicle perfectly executed an end-around run and scampered past the officers of the law.

In a bit of broken field running that rivals the likes of Ottis Anderson, the adolescent brilliantly decided to head back into the stadium and up into the stands, where the gendarmes quickly lost sight of their man. Late reports from the Department of Public Safety deny that the pubescent completely eluded them and reported to reports of a missing ball.

The game ball was awarded to Sgt. "X".

Another highlight of the game was the program. Press boxers get their programs free, which is always nice. Dennis Dent was on the cover of last week's program, which is all very fine and good, except for the fact that Dennis Dent does not go to school here any more. If they were looking to get the alumni into a teary nostalgic mood to solicit donations out of them, they could at least have tried Greg Landry. The Dennis Dent Generation is working the late shift at the All-Star 24-Hour Dairy Store.

For school spirit they could have at least put that Marching Band jerk on the cover, or something like that.

"Third home game in a row," said a fellow from the Sports Information Office about this homecoming game, "I can't take much more." Come to think of it, can you think of a Homecoming game when the team wasn't home the week before?

Poor Mike McEvilly. Mike's hometown of Clinton honored him at halftime, but Mike just looked sort of bored with the whole thing. If it had been a comic book, a little word-balloon would have appeared over Mike's head saying, "I gotta get outa here."

Chancellor Koffler was at the game, in the booth that still has Chancellor Bromery's name on the door. He's a cherubic sort and unless you look down you'll probably miss him entirely. But there he was, mixing among the sports types, wearing a little stick-on badge that proclaimed: 'Henry Koffler -- Chancellor'

And the win over Rhode Island gives the Minutemen a tighter lock on a top four finish in NCAA division I-AA especially on the heels of the Florida A & M loss. Which means a playoff game, and, of course, TV. Rumor has it that the inimitable Frank Broyles, who was the color commentator during the Florida A & M championship game, has a shot at doing this one. Better yet, they say he has even learned how to pronounce, 'Massachusetts.'

The women's field hockey team remained undefeated by downing the Northeastern Huskies 2-1 last Saturday in Boston. (Staff photo by Ben Marsden).

Library report misleading on status of falling bricks

By BRIAN O'CONNELL
Collegian Staff

Preliminary reports by the state's Bureau of Building Construction last Friday stating that library bricks are not in danger of falling were "misleading" and "blown out of proportion," UMass News Director Art Clifford said yesterday.

Accrding to BBC's Director Stuart Lessar, the BBC could recommend to University administrators that the troubled 28-story library be re-opened in six to eight weeks, depending on test results.

Lessar also said the possibility of brick panels falling off the library facade "does not appear to be a possibility at this moment."

Saying that BBC's preliminary report "didn't really say anything," Clifford added, "Nothing I have heard Lessar say contradicts what the Loomis report says." Loomis and Loomis, Inc. of Windsor, Conn. is the firm that recommended to Chancellor Henry Koffler in August that the library be closed to avoid a "disaster."

Clifford added that he "expects" the library to be reopened sometime this semester for faculty members, grad students, and undergraduate honor students. Clifford also said that undergraduates would have access to the library "if they needed it."

Howard White, spokesman for UMass President David Knapp's office in Boston, called the BBC statement "inaccurate," saying that he "hasn't seen anything that says the library will re-open" in the near future. However, White admitted that the test results on the library compiled by the BBC may have "very different conclusions" than the report by Loomis and Loomis.

"We won't make any judgements yet," he said. "We're still waiting for the preliminary reports to come in."

Springfield Daily News reporter Buffy Spencer, who quoted Lessar's remarks regarding the possibility of the library reopening, said she was "surprised" by the BBC director's comments, and "had to ask him to repeat himself, just so I was sure I had heard him right.

"I know my information is correct and I back my story fully," she said.

Lessar could not be reached for comment.

Crumbling roof may force out Gormanites

By NORM WHITEHURST
Collegian Staff

Several students from Gorman Dormitory in Central Residential Area may have to move next semester if the building's roof is not fixed soon, according to a statement submitted by residents to the University Ombudsman Monday afternoon.

"Students were not told that the rooms assigned to them were in bad condition," said a Resident Assistant on the fourth floor of Gorman. "Some rooms were closed last year because the living conditions were intolerable but students have been assigned to these same rooms this semester without any repairs being done," he said.

Plaster from the walls and ceilings is crumbling in many rooms on the upper floors. Water stains cover the ceilings and students are forced to put plastic sheets on the ceilings to protect their furniture.

"This has been going on for three years now," said Gorman resident Chris Donigian. "Last year students were forced to move out of their rooms and be relocated because their rooms were so bad."

Inter-City Roofing of Worcester, the job contractor, is delaying the work, Project Engineer William Shuman of the UMass Physical Plant said.

"They delayed sending literature about the materials they would use—a University requirement," he said.

Inter-City Roofing was informed in a letter in July to begin work, but according to Shuman it denied ever receiving the letter.

"When UMass officials tried to contact the contractor by phone, their calls were never returned," Shuman added.

UMass sent a letter to the Boston Bonding Agency to free the University from the contract Monday.

"The letter calls for action," said Shuman. "We want to either be freed from the contract or to have this contractor begin work immediately." Shuman stated that he did not know when a response would be received.

"We are not that concerned about rebates or rent refunds," one resident said. "We just want our roof fixed. This has gone on long enough."

Residents of Gorman have scheduled a meeting with the ombudsman today for more advice.

By JOANNE HUNTER

The walls are still blue, the beer is still flowing and pulsating music can still be heard, but where are all the people?

The Blue Wall, a cafeteria by day and a bar at night, sold "the most beer east of the Mississippi" between 1973 and 1978, according to Blue Wall acting beverage manager Jim Muldoon.

But "liquor sales have dropped 60 percent since last year and attendance has dropped 50 percent," because of the drinking age hike from 18 to 20 in April, Muldoon said. Yet the Blue Wall is the only bar in the area that admits students under 20.

Lack of promotion and advertising of bands, the under-20 environment, the cafeteria atmosphere, the long weekends and the closing of the library seem to be some reasons why the bar is suffering, according to Collegian interviews of Blue Wall and Union Program Council spokespersons, and students.

Many of the students interviewed said they do not like the Blue Wall because the people who frequent it get drunk and obnoxious. Some women said the men there are "rude" and act like they are at a "meat market." Most students under 20 who were interviewed said they do not go because they are segregated from people who are 20 and over.

Other students said they do not go because their friends do not go, they go to parties instead of bars, or the crowd is too young and they do not like the entertainment. Some students under 20 were unaware that they were able to get in at all.

Yet the Blue Wall is allowed to serve students under 20 since the bar is now divided by a wall. The bar's new arrangement is similar to its set-up in the 60's when the drinking age was 21. The wall segregates minors legally by keeping them away from the bar, but they can still purchase non-alcoholic refreshments.

A Top of the Campus sticker and proof of age are required for admission into the drinking area.

"I don't go because it reminds me of a cafeteria with an impersonal atmosphere," said a student, Sue Sommer.

And another student, Beth Teixeira said, "When the Hatch was open I'd float back and forth between the Hatch and the Blue Wall. Now that the Hatch isn't open I don't go anymore."

All people concerned are doing their best to change the situation, an unidentified UPC representative said. Plans for the future include the addition of pinball machines, a new system of bookings and a discount coupon system. The UPC and the Blue Wall itself book bands for the bar, usually for Thursday through Saturday nights.

Another plan, the UPC representative said, is to again have enter[illegible] week including [illegible]

Teddy talks turkey with Ella

HARTFORD [AP] — Gov. Ella Grasso said yesterday she had received a telephone call from Sen. Edward Kennedy in which he discussed his presidential plans.

Grasso said she has been and will remain a staunch supporter of President Carter despite the approach from Kennedy.

Kennedy reportedly has been contacting prominent Democrats throughout the country, discussing his plans for a challenge to Carter.

Grasso would not reveal exactly what was said in the Tuesday morning telephone conversation.

"I expect he will be making his own announcment," she said.

House approves gas rationing

WASHINGTON [AP] — The House approved a new standby gasoline rationing system for the nation yesterday, ending the latest round of bickering that has spanned three Congresses and two presidential administrations.

By a 301-112 margin, the House accepted a compromise rationing measure. A prime feature of the legislation is a provision giving Congress veto power over implementation of the rationing plan.

The bill sent to the White House gives the president authority to move toward rationing if gasoline or diesel fuel supplies fall below 20 percent and if a shortage seems likely to last at least 30 days.

Czech activists sentenced

PRAGUE, Czechoslovakia — Dramatist Vaclav Havel and five other human rights activists were convicted last night on charges of subversion and given prison sentences ranging up to five years.

The official Ceteka news agency said Havel, 43, was sentenced to 4¼ years and Peter Uhl, a 38-year-old Trotskyite, was given five years at the end of the two-day court proceedings that ended Czechoslovakia's biggest dissident trial since 1972.

Lesser sentences were given to the four other defendants.

Nuclear licensing continues, Carter commission rules

By H. JOSEF HEBERT
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — A presidential commission, while highly critical of those involved in the Three Mile Island nuclear accident, has concluded that safety problems do not warrant a halt in construction or licensing of new nuclear reactors, according to panel sources.

The 12-member commission, appointed last April to probe the Harrisburg nuclear accident, completed its six-month investigation sharply divided over the issue of whether to call for a moratorium on new reactor construction until its safety recommendations are acted upon.

One source said yesterday the moratorium question encompassed "a long involved discussion that went on for three days" with the six supporters of a moratorium one vote shy of getting it approved.

The commission's findings and recommendations, which are only advisory, will be presented to President Carter, probably next Tuesday. The president has said he hoped to follow up on the panel's recommendations "where practical."

Nuclear industry representatives said yesterday they were relieved the moratorium was not approved, though one industry executives conceded rejection apparently came only "by the skin of your teeth."

"It would have been something that we would have been up in arms about," said Carl Walske, president of the Atomic Industrial Forum. He said a moratorium on future construction, "would have done great damage" since it would have jeopardized a number of planned projects.

Some nuclear critics, meanwhile, were disappointed that the commission is not making a stronger statement on the future of nuclear power.

"They apparently are not able to say clearly that either the program is safe and can go ahead or that it is not safe and has to be reformed," said Peter Fachout, a spokesman for the Union of Concerned Scientists.

According to several commission sources, the panel will call for a broad reorganization of the Nuclear Regulatory Commission, saying it has not paid adequate attention to safety matters under its present structure.

The panel will suggest the current five-member panel be replaced by a single administrator and that licenses for nuclear plants be subject to review on a regular basis.

The commission currently makes decisions by a majority vote, and a power plant now is licensed only once.

The commission report will conclude that "fundamental changes" must occur in the attitude of the NRC and the industry about safety if an accident such as Three Mile Island is not repeated.

China trade status raised

By R. GREGORY NOKES
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Carter sent to Congress yesterday a trade agreement granting most-favored-nation treatment to China, giving it tariff advantages not yet available to the Soviet Union.

In letters to the presiding officers of the Senate and House, Carter said, "Conclusion of this agreement is the most important step we can take to provide greater economic benefits to both countries from this relationship.

"It will also give further impetus to the progress we have made in our overall relationship since normalization of our diplomatic relations earlier this year."

The agreement should make possible an expansion of U.S.China trade to $5 billion a year by 1985, up from $1.2 billion last year, said Kempton Jenkins, deputy secretary of commerce for East-West trade.

Jenkins said the expected $5 billion in two-way trade by 1985 will be made up of $4 billion in U.S. exports and $1 billion in imports from China, leaving a balance of $3 billion in favor of the United States. But he said the trade agreement is designed to strengthen trade in both directions.

Carter also signed a proclamation waiving requirements of the Jackson-Vanik amendment to the trade act as they apply to China. He thus lifted restrictions in the amendment that prohibit most-favored-nation treatment for communist nations which fail to allow free emigration of their citizens.

By law, the waiver will not take effect unless both houses of Congress agree. They have 60 days in which to act. The Jackson-Vanik amendment is named for its sponsors, Sen. Henry M. Jackson, D-Wash., and Rep. Charles A. Vanik, DOhio.

The United States has yet to extend most-favored-nation trade treatment to the Soviet Union. Despite the name, most-favored-nation tariffs are the tariffs applied to imports from nearly all U.S. trading partners.

U.S. officials had said repeatedly they hoped to be able to ask Congress to approve most-favored-nation status for the Soviet Union at the same time it was being approved for China. This was one reason the administration delayed in sending the agreement with China to Congress, even though the pact was initialed five months ago.

By DONNA SULLIVAN

From departmental secretaries to bookkeepers, jobs traditionally and currently held by women represent the nucleus of the University's work force.

"It's phenomenal that things are done as efficiently as they are," said Associate Registrar Mary Ellen Hanley who recently came to UMass from a much smaller institution. "Secretaries are the unsung heroes on this campus."

Hanley works in the Registrar's Office where 23 women and one man are responsible for a sizable work load. Besides registering students for courses, the Registrar's Office checks students' core requirements for graduation, keeps their permanent records, and keeps up with everyday office procedures.

Three women supervise the office staff in the Registrar's Office—Sandra Watkins, Anita Hannigan, and Marion Markwell. "We are the manual part," Watkins said, "We do the work."

Watkins is in charge of the Records Office, supervising the issuance of suspension letters, transcripts, class changes, pass/fail courses and graduation clearances.

Hannigan supervises the Transcript Office, which takes charge of records for anyone who has ever attended the University. The office keeps track of class rank, honors, and double majors, constantly updating students' records.

Markwell, supervisor of the Registrar's Office, takes care of add/drop procedures, grade rosters, permanent housing, copies of schedules and bills.

According to Watkins, credit for work should go to the secretaries. "The key word is availability," she said. "People depend on us being here all the time, and they come to us. Secretaries handle 99 percent of the work."

Departmental secretaries have double duties, acting as right-hand-women for professors and also providing services for students.

According to a secretary of one academic department, secretaries answer students' questions about classes, scheduling, and core requirements. "We help them select courses, select course levels and fulfill the needs of their major," she said.

In her work for professors, she is a receptionist and a confidential secretary. She schedules appointments, courses, office hours, seminars and speakers. She does bookkeeping work, handles all mail, conducts a yearly physical inventory, and keeps track of the work study students in the department.

According to the secretary, the University would be unable to run without the female working force, and would be forced to close.

Paula Burgielewicz is officially the secretary to the Director of General Physical Education, but her actual output includes work done for over 130 people. Burgielewicz types, answers the phone, takes messages and runs errands for four varsity sport coaches, two staff assistants, and over 130 undergraduate students who teach general physical education.

A job less obvious to most students yet vital in running the University, is that of the bookkeepers in the Treasurer's Office. The job of keeping the University's books involves a large volume of work—assisting with cash management, handling the petty cash account and the payroll account, and dealing with bad checks.

"I don't see how the University could run without women," one bookkeeper said. "The positions that women fill are usually the core of the work that gets done. Women are the ones that are doing the nitty gritty work."

Ginny Hebert, secretary to the Director of Student Serices said, "Women are the front line staff. People see us before they see other people." Without the University secretaries, the University "would come to a grinding halt," she said.

Grad senate opposes Proposition 2½

By LAURA SMITH
Collegian Staff

The Graduate Student Senate voted last night to oppose passage of so-called Proposition 2½, which would limit property taxes to 2.5 percent of market value, and also urged graduate students to sign the faculty union or Tax Justice petition against the proposal.

Senate President Monte Pearson spoke in favor of opposition of the proposed law, and cited the petition and the Tax Justice petition as alternatives. Proposition 2½, he said, has received widespread opposition from higher education organizations in the state because of possible budget cuts which may result.

One of the alternatives, the petition proposed by the Massachusetts Teacher's Association, would limit state and local tax increases to the percentage rise of personal incomes in the state. It would also increase the state's share of local education costs.

The Tax Justice Act proposed by several labor and citizens' groups would cut residential property taxes in most of the state by 15 percent, while guaranteeing local aid. Additional state revenues would be provided by closing the tax loopholes to corporations in areas where costs cannot easily be passed on to consumers in the form of higher prices or less jobs.

Senator Gary Cridler-Smith, representing the Food and Resource Economics Department, said "what Massachusetts really needs is a comprehensive tax overhaul."

In other business, the senate said there is now a job board for graduate students who are seeking jobs outside their departments. The board is located on the second floor of the Graduate Research Center, outside the Graduate Registration Office.

The senate also stated that revenue sharing forms should be available next Tuesday at the senate meeting or can be picked up at the Graduate Senate Office in Campus Center 919.

Qu'est-ce que c'est? The Talking Heads

After a sell-out concert at UMass last fall, the popular new-wave band Talking Heads is returning Nov. 11 to do it again.

Talking Heads performed last year in Bowker Auditorium but will appear for this concert at the Fine Arts Center Concert Hall with an unannounced guest.

Band members are lead vocalist and guitarist, David Byrne; drummer, Chris Frantz; keyboard player and guitarist, Jerry Harrison; and bass player, Martina Weymouth.

A new band, the Talking Heads has released three albums since 1977, which are respectively, Talking Heads, with their hit song "Psycho Killer;" More Songs About Buildings and Food; and Fear of Music.

Tickets for the concert, sponsored by the Union Program Council, go on sale Oct. 25 at the Fine Arts Center Box Office, Union Records Unlimited, and Platterpus. Tickets will cost $7, $6.50 and $6 for UMass students and $1 more for non-students.

UMass honors Bond in dedication ceremony

By VUKANI MAGUBANE
Black Affairs Staff

The University on Monday formally announced the naming of the Horace Mann Bond Center for Equal Education and the acquisition of the Bond papers in a ceremony at the Marks Meadow Auditorium at the School of Education.

Present at the ceremony were Bond's widow, Mrs. Julia Bond; their son Georgia State Senator Julian Bond; Chancellor Henry Koffler; Dean Mario Fantini of the School of Education; Professor Meyer Weinberg, director of the Bond Center for Equal Education and John Aubrey Davis a City College of New York professor and longtime friend of Horace Bond.

Bond, a distinguished black scholar and educator committed his life to promoting the right to equal education for every child.

According to Fantini, "the acquisition of the Bond papers, along with the W.E.B DuBois papers, form an important set of resources, not only for the University but for the nation and the rest of the world as well."

The Bond papers, comparable in size with the DuBois papers already housed at the UMass library, arrived several weeks ago. They measure 150 linear feet and include a half century of research on Black education, family papers and correspondence, family geneology and letters to DuBois.

"The existence of both sets of papers tend to the mutual enhancement of each other," said John Kendall, a library representative.

"There is no more fitting a companion of DuBois than the acquiring of the Bond papers," Koffler said.

Weinberg called the Bond papers "one of the most significant collections on school desegregation in the world."

"It's a great honor to head the Center and have it bear the name of Horace Mann Bond," he said.

"The Center will not only be for study and research, but will also serve as a national clearinghouse on desegregation and every factor on inequality and education of minority children worldwide," Weinberg said.

The Center will store information on racial and other social factors that deter the achievement of first rate education for every child.

"The Center has 104 steel file drawers of information that include 4,000 volumes of commercially unpublished works, 500 dissertations from all over the world, 42,000 ongoing bibliographical entries on minority children and state by state material on racial and other factors of unequal education," Weinberg said.

Horace Mann Bond was well known for his broad scholarship and understanding of the role of black education in America's social structure. "He was able to combine his understanding of Black American education to a world context. He understood the total world context in which Black education stood," Weinberg said.

Senator Bond, in paying tribute to his father said, "Above all he was a father, husband and teacher to his family. He taught us how to love and cherish other human beings."

Referring to Saturday's dedication to the John F. Kennedy library and the W.E.B. DuBois homestead, Bond said, "It is the merest of coincidence to honor three honorable men within three days. They were all creatures of their time and sought service to others."

Horace Mann Bond's widow, Julia Bond addresses the audience at the dedication of the Horace Mann Bond Papers, Monday. Their son, Georgia State Senator Julian Bond was also present.

Letter to the Community

The Third World Women's Task Force supports the committee which has been organized for the defense of the three black women who were attacked by police officers in Russell's Liquor Store.

We must remember the injustices, violences and deaths inflicted upon members of the Third World community here in the Pioneer Valley.

REMEMBER!!!:
Seta Rampersad, Jill Dickinson, Jose Pontes, Earl Brown, Craemen Gethers, the cross burnings, and other incidents of repression and violence.

As Third World people we strongly urge you to support us in our struggle against this form of brutality. Remember: THIS CAN HAPPEN TO YOU!!! The three women will be arraigned today at 9:00 a.m. at Northampton District Court. Anyone interested in supporting the three victims of racism are welcome to attend the court hearing.

There will also be a demonstration on October 27th at 2:00 p.m. on the Amherst Commons.

Repression will not end by itself. It is up to us to stop it. We can't continue to hide behind our books—it's time to face the truth and ACT!

Hypocritical U.S. in Africa

It is my feeling that America, by letting American Business invest in South Africa, is supporting racism and a form of slavery. American businesses have no right being in such a racist, oppressed state.

By investing in South Africa, American is being totally hypocritical. Instead of helping the majority, American is helping to suppress the majority. America claims to be the land of the free, land of life, liberty, and equality. How can a country make such a statement when they are on the other side of the world investing on a country that is enslaved, racist, and makes a mockery out of liberty and justice?

The reason is: for the money of course. Everyone of the top 300 businesses in America have branches in South Africa. This includes General Motors, Ford, Mobil, Exxon and other "Equal Opportunity Employers". The profits are tremendous. American business is making record profits. Often, the profits are more than they make in places like Hong Kong. Just how far will America go for a buck?

To help you answer this question, let me explain the work situation in South Africa (keep in mind that American companies enforce these laws). The main law is that no black person can have a job higher than any white person; this means that there is not one black person in South Africa getting paid more than a white person. If a black person misses a day of work or disobeys the order of a white he will be thrown in jail. Black men are separated from their families. The men live in work camps outside of the city and their families live in Bantustans (deserts) hundreds of miles away. They are only allowed to see each other one month out of the year. In work camps the main and only dish is porridge. There are up to 16 people living in an area the size of a dorm room. Back at the Bantustan one out of every two children die from malnutrition. Blacks don't receive any job benefits or insurance or any other kinds of job preferences. In the gold and diamond mines, for example, an average of four blacks die per shift. While the whites get all the benefits, better safety equipment, half as much working hours and sixteen times the pay.

The problems don't stop with jobs. For example, it is against the law for blacks to earn property. There is a dusk till dawn curfew effective for blacks only.

I hope you can understand why I called the treatment of blacks a form of slavery. So next time you buy gold or diamonds or any product from the top 300 companies; remember that you are supporting this inhumanity. I'm not suggesting that you boycott all these companies, because that is impossible. I'm just pointing out how bad the situation is, and suggesting that you try to do something to get American business out of South Africa.

Du Bois homesite designated landmark

By MARLENE DUNCAN
Black Affairs Staff

On Saturday October 20, the homesite of W.E.B. DuBois was designated as a national historical landmark. This was a momentous event for all persons involved, in particular, Herbert Aptheker, who for the past ten years has fought to give DuBois an inkling of the recognition he deserves.

Among the distinguished guests included: David Grahm DuBois, stepson of DuBois, Walter Wilson, co-founder of the DuBois Memorial committee, Dr. Quaison-Sackey, the Ghanain Ambassador, Counsellor Xie Quine from the embassy of the Peopls Republic of China, Randolf Bromery, former chancellor of UMass, Mike Thelwell, professor of the Afro-AM. department, Margret Bush Wilson, chairperson of the board of directors of the NAACP, Elma lewis of the NCAA, and as keynote speaker, Julian Bond, Senator of Georgia.

All spoke of the leader's greatness and his potential of being "the greatest man of the century—a citizen of the world." Their speeches reflected the honor and pride which is derived from the DuBois Legacy. They spoke of DuBois' diligency and committment in the struggle for humanity.

DuBois' vocational and literary prose has served as an inspiration—and exemplifies a mode in which all oppressed people should pattern their lives. The ignorance of his contributions to the total history of the world is a failure of democracy.

Most significant of his statements was his analysis of the major problem in the twentieth century— "The problem of the color line." Through his dedication he lived to develop solid foundation for our generation to stand on. For too long he has been "a prophet without honor in his own country."

In the words of Margret Bush Wilson, the ceremony was "fitting, appropriate and long overdue." As Walter Wilson states it, "when we honor DuBois, we honor ourselves." To paraphrase Mike Thelwell, "the U.S. has a historically if not revolutionary responsibility to honor DuBois." He spoke of how it is truly OUR honor to be embraced by his "spirit and example" and that the dedication itself was an honor to Berkshire County.

Through the process of intergration and the miseducation of America we have lost an opportunity to express the trends of history through the Black perspective. As Elma Lewis states it, "We must make the youth knowledgdgable of his contributions to cause them to understand the Legacy." It is our duty to extend our knowledge to the youth and give them a glorified history which will enhance their cultural pride and identitv.

Bromery said, "Every group is measured by their talented tenth and we must strive for intellectual achievement." A path has been constructed and we must discipline ourselves to adhere to and react to our conditions." DuBois is known as an agitator. He voiced one's defeat as having a cynistic attitude towards struggle. "One must make a living, but above all one must make a life," he said.

We must continue to fight for truth because the antedote lies within us and our children. With our children informed we become a more powerful people. "DuBois' name must become a household word within our culture. Until all that is done our jobs are not finished," said Bush. Mike Thelwell so accurately phrased it, "Dr. DuBois still lives."

I would like to take this opportunity to express our dissatisfaction over the lack of coverage of the dedication by the mass media. Once again, the progressive activities of Black people has gone unrecognized. But this has helped to strengthen our resolutions in continuing to publicize the importance of these events.

"We face similar problems, that have to be attacked in different says," said William Grant of the Springfield Chapter of the National Association for theAdvancement of Colored People. The chapter was on hand last Saturday to honor one of the co-founders of NAACP, W.E.B. DuBois, whose homesite was dedicated as a National Historical Landmark.

"Black people are sadly mistaken if they think that we have done enough work. We are progressing but regressing at the same time." Grant said. According to the NAACP, "part of that retrogession has been disenchantment of the Jews. For a long time the Jews have supplied funds the organization and now they are being held back."

The Springfield chapter of the NAACP won this year's statewide membership drive. The trophey was displayed at the ceremony. The President, Leroy Claybourne said that the trophy is awarded as an incentive to get chapters drive vigorously for members. The trophy was awarded by the New England Conference of NAACP Branches for the largest percentage membership increase.

"The chapter in Springfield has 704 members and we expect to reach the 1,000 mark by the end of the year," Claybourne said.

DuBois helped to establish the NAACP as far back as 1906, when the organization emberged as a forebearer of the Niagara Movement. The Movement was a meeting of black intellectuals at the time to discuss racism in the United States.

DuBois became editor of the NAACP's magazine The Crisis, a position which he held for 24 years.

Quoting the Berkshire Eagle, "As The Crisis editor, DuBois fought relentlessly for the Negro cause. He drew on all the rhetorical weapons he could command — history, fact, fiction, invective, humour. And it was here that he reached the peak of his power and influence."

DuBois was not always a member of the NAACP. He resigned his editorial position and left the NAACP in 1934 at the age of 66 and went to Atlanta University. Ten years later he was back with the NAACP and stayed with the organization for four years.

The problem of the 20th century is the color line... Men of America the problem is plain before you. Here is a race transplanted through the criminal foolishness of your fathers. Whether you like it or not the millions are here, and here they will remain. If you do not lift them up, they will pull you down." W.E.B. Du Bois

JFK tribute turns political

News analysis

By JIM MORAN
Collegian Staff

BOSTON – The dedication of the John F. Kennedy Library at the UMass-Boston campus Saturday was significant not only from an historical perspective, but also for the political statement it made.

President Carter wasn't being purely sentimental when he said, "President Kennedy understood the past and respected its shaping of the future." Rather, he was using it to lead into his own manifesto for policies of the next Carter Administration, should it evolve.

Carter plugged the SALT II Treaty, citing the late President Kennedy's signature of the Nuclear Test Ban Treaty in 1963. "He warned against turning the world 'into a prison in which man awaits his executioner,'" Carter said. "Sixteen years later, the Salt II Treaty can redeem that hope."

Again, the president switched gears to politics, telling the crowd, "The world of 1980 is as different from that of 1960 as the world of 1960 was from that of 1940. Our efforts to improve that world must be different as well." Mentioning a host of problems ranging from big government to the energy crisis to inflation, Carter was implying that the policies of liberal predecessors like president Kennedy would not be a solution to the issues of today. Inferred from that could be an attack of Sen. Edward M. Kennedy's ideology.

Sen. Kennedy brought his own philosophy of government to the forefront when he delivered his remarks. Though not as direct a "hit" as Carter's speech, with its much-publicized JFK anecdote on seeking the presidency, the senator did get around to politics. His commitment to faith in government was made evident. "The library is more than a collection of photographs and objects under glass," he said. "Across the country it will reach out to visitors and scholars, summoning young men and women to careers in public life."

Then the senator analogized the politics of JFK's New Frontier with the social issues of today, putting in a pitch for his own health insurance bill. "He taught us to redeem the promise of health care for America's senior generation, to whom the nation owes so much of its present greatness," Kennedy said.

Of the library itself, both men had words of praise. Carter said, "Its grace and dignity are, I hope and believe, worthy of the man who's memory it will nurture." The senator said, "In dedicating this library to Jack, we recall those years of grace, that time of hope. The spark still glows, the journey never ends, the dream shall never die."

Both talked about human rights. Speaking pointedly, the president remarked, "As a Southerner I saw firsthand how the moral leadership of the Kennedy administration helped undo the wrongs that grew out of our nation's history." Carter said that racism has no place "in the South or North," perhaps referring to the problems rising from desegration of schools in cities like Boston.

When he made his remarks in support of civil rights, Kennedy alluded to the racial strife in Boston and the shooting of Darryl Williams, a black student shot while playing football in Charlestown.

"My brother taught us to make freedom ring in America—freedom for black and brown as well as white, freedom to learn in a public classroom, to play football on a public field," Kennedy said.

Perhaps the most political of all the speeches came not from the two presidential aspirants, but from a rising political star in the person of Joseph P. Kennedy, III, son of the late Sen. Robert F. Kennedy. Young Kennedy eulogized his father, speaking of his commitment to the cause of the underprivileged. "I hope and pray that my generation of Americans will do their share, will summon the 'moral courage' my father referred to and with it work to bring about the decent and just world he so much wanted to see in his lifetime," he said.

He also spoke of the "principalities and powers" that

Illegal chemical dumps pose threat to NE towns

By MARGARET NELSON
Associated Press

NEW CASTLE, N.H. – Experts on chemical and industrial wastes said yesterday thousands of undiscovered chemical dumps around New England could soon cause severe public health problems for the region.

One speaker at the Northeast Conference on Hazardous Wastes estimated New England's illegal dumping sites may total 2,000, or 10 times as many as already have been found.

Despite the problems of illegal dumping, the experts said, few towns are willing to have a secure disposal site within their borders.

"Chemical waste lasts just as long as radioactive waste, and it is just as hazardous," said Peter Skinner, an engineer with the New York state attorney general's office.

Skinner suggested states should assume the responsibility for creating safe places to treat and dispose of chemicals generated by industry.

But Philip Gidley of Exeter, N.H., maintained that towns, not state governments, should be repsonsible for dealing with the byproducts of industrial development.

The town of Exeter plans to build a hazardous waste landfill for wastes from its own industries, Gidley said. But he noted all the industries in the town have agreed to pre-treat their own wastes.

Gidley claimed manufacturers that produce toxic chemical solvents can use pre-treating to reduce the volume of the solvents by 95 percent, in addition to making the solvents less dangerous.

Earlier in the day, representatives of the Arthur D. Little consulting firm of Cambridge, Mass., presented a report prepared for the New England Regional Commission. The study said about 300 million gallons of toxic materials are created in New England each year by about 4,500 firms.

According to the report, landfills should be considered only a short-term solution for disposing of toxic wastes. The study suggested about 50 million gallons of the waste could be burned and about 100 million gallons could be treated to reduce volume and hazards.

Experts pointed out that at the moment, there is no secure place in New England for disposing any kind of hazardous waste. Gidley estimated as many as 2,000 illegal dumping grounds may be scattered throughout New England.

"It will cost hundreds of millions of dollars to clean up those problems," he said.

U.S.-PLO talks are nothing new

James Lewis

On August 20, 1979, an article by Joseph Harch of the Christian Science Monitor stated: "On March 26, 1979, at the White House in Washington, Israeli Prime Minister Menachem Begin signed a document promising to begin within one month negotiations aimed at 'the establishment of the self-governing authority in the West Bank and Gaza in order to provide full autonomy to the inhabitants.'

"Mr. Begin also committed himself on that day at the White House to 'the goal of completing the negotiations within one year so that elections will be held as expeditiously as possible.'

"The text covering these two points about a future authority by Arabs and for Arabs in the West Bank and Gaza also says that the Egyptian and Jordanian delegations to such talks 'may include Palestinians.' "

The United States has been having semi-official and secret meetings with the PLO since 1967, according to Mr. Harch, and they even happened under Secretary of State Henry Kissinger. The PLO officials state that former Secretary of State, Henry Kissinger initially agreed in November, 1976, to the opening of a PLO information office in Washington headed by a prominent Beirut-based official. But, they add, he subsequently withdrew his consent, according to James Dorsey, the Christian Science Monitor. According to the article by Dorsey, negotiations on the opening of the office were held in Washington between two visiting PLO officials, Dr. Issam Sartawi, a close associate of PLO leader Yasser Arafat, and Sabri Jiryis, now head of the Beirut-based Palestine Research Center, and the former US Ambassador to Jordan and Lebanon, L. Dean Brown. The negotiations began November 8, 1976, when Dr. Sartawi and Mr. Jiryis were invited to a luncheon at Washington's Cosmos Club by Mr. Brown and Landrum Bolling, then director of the Lily Endowment.

Legally, there was/is nothing prohibiting the PLO from opening the PLO information office in Washington.

On November 18. 1976, Mr. Jiryis formally registered with the Justice Department. An attack by the Israeli Ambassador in the U.S. Simca Dinitz, followed the formal registration of the PLO information office in Washington. Senior State Department officials assured Israeli diplomates in Washington that the U.S. approach to the question of the PLO's status had remained unchanged even if that organization did open an office in the American capital. During the negotiations, Dr. Sartawi was reporting back in Damascus with Mr. Arafat.

The problem was that Mr. Sartawi and Mr. Jiryis did not have proper passports and needed an extension on their visas to consider the negotiations. On December 3, 1976, Mr. Brown called Mr. Sartawi from the State Department requesting an immediate meeting, in which Mr. Brown is said to have asked Mr. Sartawi on instructions of Mr. Kissinger to leave the country in order to avoid trouble. No explanation for Mr. Kissinger's sudden change of heart was given. December 4, 1976, at a State Department breakfast Dr. Kissinger informed Israeli Ambassador Dinitz that the United States was directing Mr. Jiryis to leave the country.

According to Dorsey, "Within minutes after Mr. Brown's departure, two criminal investigators were at Mr. Sattawi's hotel room door. They demanded Mr. Sartawi's diplomatic passport, which contained as assumed name and had been given to him by a friendly Arab country."

Mr. Jiryis was not able to get a passport representing the PLO from Israel, the place of his birth. On December 9, 1976, Mr. Sartawi left the U.S. Mr. Sartawi contacted other Arab ambassadors to urge the U.S. not to push him out of the country, but later, the Arab government officials urged Mr. Sartawi to immediately leave the U.S.

Apparently, talking with the PLO has been practiced in the United States before.

The 'Russell's' incident

Joel Saxe

A recent jogging experience from my apartment just north of the University offers a round-about introduction to the issues of racism, sexism and police brutality raised by the arrests of three Black women in the Russell's Liquor Store by the Amherst Police on Sept. 29.

Heading down a quiet, nice-looking, neatly manicured private road, I was hastened to stop by an aging, grey-suited, university-corporate executive looking man.

Not wanting to break my pace, I slowed down enough to hear him instruct me in a highly-superior fashion: "This is a private drive (making a sweeping gesture with his arm) – this is private property—" and I quickly realized he was instructing me off "his property."

Back to the immediate case. Briefly, the three women were subjected to rude and disrespectful language and behavior by a store clerk, which they preceived as being racially based. As any normal person might, they reacted, verbally, in an angry, defensive manner. The Amherst Police were immediately on the scene, treating the women as violent criminals, physically assaulting and arresting them. (One of the women, weighing 95 pounds, was thrown against a wire rack, and then onto the floor, where she was handcuffed, and physically sat upon by an Amherst Police Officer.)

Their crime? "Disorderly Conduct", say the Police. "Law and Order." And so it is: their color—Black; their gender—female. You be the judge. Would the same thing have happened if they had been three white women or men? What do you think?

The issue of racist and sexist brutality by the police is by no means new. Add the closed case of Seta Rampersad: A Black UMass student, whose dead body was found in a motel room in South Deerfield, after having been physically abused to unconsciousness, and then abandoned by three whites—all escaping prosecution (one of the men wields a good deal of economic and political power in the area).

Add the prison time spent by Earl Brown and Cramen Gethers: Two Black UMass students, who several years ago were the victims of a racist frame-up.

Here is where my aging corporate-executive minded friend—staunch defender of property relations, comes in.

His values, reflecting those dominant within U.S. society, place more importance on property relations than human relations. And it is this set of values, establishing the basis for a larger system of oppression—Capitalism—which has at its roots, a power source of violence and terror based on the oppressive apparatus of the state: police.

Take housing for example. I live in an apartment owned by D.H. Jones, who with a few others holds a near monopoly of real estate in Amherst, charging exorbitant rents, driving land values higher and pushing out the local farming community. So why do I pay? Do a human set of values dictate that I should pay him, or any other of the big-time rip-off landlords in Amherst? Or rather is it the fear of good old "law and order" policemen coming to take me away?

How about health care? A friend of mine was hit with a $50 bill for a shot of adrenlin to calm an athsma attack! Our "legal system" allows for what can only be called highway robbery, with values of private property meaning that income rather than need determines one's physical health.

So where to begin?

If the police only reflect a set of values which elevates property over people, then the changes must be as much from within each of us, as from some outside force—the willingness of each of us to stand up for a new set of human values based on democratic ideals. Personal values and a daily life-style based on concern for the human needs of all withing our community—as opposed to a maddening run for a steadily sinking buck.

The choice is yours. Stand up for human justice, and attend the pre-trial hearing today at 9 a.m. at the Northampton County Courthouse. But beyond that, strive for a new set of values with an eye towards constructing a new democratic social reality. As far as the aging, corporate-executive types: Let their jaws hang open!

Contracts given to Western Mass, Peter Pan buses

By PAUL BANKS
Collegian Staff

The university has signed a contract with Western Mass. Bus Lines, Inc. and Peter Pan World Travel, Inc. which will authorize transportation for certain labs and field trips, Bill Barrett of the University Transit Office announced recently.

Under the new contract, Western Mass. Bus Lines will provide interstate chartered transportation while Peter Pan World Travel Inc. will provide chartered transportation to other states.

Lat year, contracts for both interstate and intrastate transportation were given to Western Mass. Bus Lines, though in the past contracts have been given to other bus lines, according to Jake Bishop, Director of Procurement.

"UMass has a legal obligation to put a service out to bid. Whoever bids the lowest for either category (inter or intrastate transportation) gets awarded," explained Al Buyam of the Transit Office.

The rates that a bus line may bid are controlled by the state Department of Public Utility. A separate bid is accepted for a variety of categories of bus service, Bishop said.

The cost of the chartered trips scheduled for the year will be paid by the group involved. Buvam said, including classes.

"There is no obligation from UMass to pay anything. The groups will pay the company's existing rate," he said.

The contracts will be in effect from October 1, 1979 until September 30, 1980, Barrett said.

Credit Union loans unaffected by economy

By MARYANNE MICCHELLI
Collegian Staff

The Federal Reserve Board's recent move to increase borrowing rates on loans will have no affect upon the UMass Credit Union's loan policies, its president and treasurer announced yesterday, since the credit union is regulated by the National Credit Union Administration.

President LeAnn Orvis and Treasurer Scott Sparr stressed the Credit Union's present interest rates are as high as they will go, and eligible members should have no difficulty in being granted loans.

Since its opening in February 1975, the credit union, a cooperative savings and loan association operated by its members and exclusively for their own mutual benefit, has granted close to $900,000 in loans. Located in the Student Union building, Sparr and Orvis said it is the largest and most successful credit union in the country.

Its membership, which now numbers over 3,500, consists of present and past university students. Membership is open to any student enrolled in a course at the university, their families, students paid with SATF monies, and organizations of students. Orvis pointed out that currently the credit union has over $650,000 is assets.

Members of the credit union are "owners" who elect a Board and a credit committee to review loan applications. Each credit union member has one vote, regardless of the size of his or her savings account.

The credit union is staffed by approximately 85 members, all of whom are volunteers. New volunteers are continually being recruited. Employees generally begin as tellers and work their way into management-level positions. Sparr stressed that not all of the employees are business majors, and Orvis added that work at the credit union serves as "good practical business experience" as well as offering an excellent opportunity to work with others.

The amount of time devoted to the credit union by its workers varies greatly. A minimum of four to six hours per week is required by tellers; top management puts in up to twenty hours per week. In addition, staff members have the opportunity to serve on various committees such as credit, accounting, collections, personnel, marketing, investments, and operations. Orvis pointed out that personnel enjoy working at the credit union.

Orvis and Sparr said the credit union is now offering a new type of savings account known as the "share certificate," with which a minimum deposit of $500 can earn a higher dividend after three months. Features of the credit union include savings accounts, low-cost loans, traveller's checks, money orders, automatic payroll savings, and food stamp service.

Sparr said that in spite of economic conditions, the credit union will continue to "better serve the needs of students" as it has in the past.

'Uncle Vanya' lacks struggle

By Anne Mehitabel
Collegian Staff

The acting and directing were solid, the costumes and set were solid. But just as the Berlin wall is solid it is also long and constant and it begs for apology for not allowing freedom of access. This lack of access to the inner life and struggles of Chekhov's characters was what was missing in University Ensemble Theatre's production of Uncle Vanya.

Uncle Vanya, like all of Chekhov's plays, is a mosaic of the trials and tribulations of the dying aristocratic class in pre-revolutionary Russia. Pivotal in this character study is Vanya who, through the course of the play, experiences the loss of a woman he never had and realizes he has been idiotically naive in his dedication to Serebryakov.

Vanya's ludicrous position in this "commedia"—his sheer humanity which should enable the audience to laugh through their tears—is absent due to Ron Willoughby's portrayal of a precious, pathetic fool, too ridiculous to arouse pathos in the audience. His cuteness, affectations and overplaying all suggest an escapee from New York's East Village who has somehow wandered on to the Rand Stage. Willoughby holds our attention but never our hearts.

Denise Koch, who plays Yelena, has fallen into the trap that many actresses do in this role and, instead of being bored, she is boring. Her hands flap incessantly and her line deliveries are as mannered as her gestures, lacking lustre and spontaneity.

The best portrayal in the production was given by Audrey Jacques, a UMass theater student. Jacques played the role of Sonya with a beautiful, measured simplicity and with what appeared to be a feeling for the comedy. The tragedy - the absurdity of life.

The only problem with the casting was that she is much too pretty to play the plain, homely Sonya. It was ludicrous to see this adorable, blushing blonde stand in front of a mirror and cry about how unattractive she is.

Jacques possesses the sensuality and ability to act—gifts which would have made her more suitable to play Yelena. In this production it seemed as if Astrov had more of a viable choice between Sonya or Vanya. Yelena should have stayed in Petersburg.

Andrew Lichtenberg was also outstanding in the cast, portraying the character of Astrov with a delicate balance of subtlety and impetuous absurdity imperative in a Chekhovian piece.

It is unfair to say that this production of Uncle Vanya is not worth seeing. It possessed some interesting directorial dimensions, but the essence of the struggle and the weaving of relationships was missing. Director Richard Trousdell cast some stock, repertory types and therefore achieved an entertaining, safe production but, not a provocative one.

U.S. senators to tour Cambodia, aid starving

By SETH MYDANS
Associated Press

BANGKOK, Thailand — Three U.S. senators will go to Phnom Penh today with a new proposal to aid Cambodia's starving people. They will be the first U.S. officials to visit the capital since the communist takeover in April 1975.

Sens. James Sasser, D-Tenn., John Danforth, R-Mo., and Max Baucus, D-Mont., would like to get a green light from the Phnom Penh government for their plan of sending truck convoys carrying a daily load of 1,000 tons of food into the country from Thailand for six months.

The senators said they had no itinerary for their one-day trip.

Spokesman Craven Crowell said the senators, who will fly in a Red Cross relief plane, were "excited about the prospect of going to Phnom Penh" but had no assurance that they would meet with any Cambodian officials there.

Although aid programs have begun for the estimated 2 million people who face starvation, Phnom Penh continues publicly to refuse aid from agencies who also supply areas controlled by ousted Premier Pol Pot. The remnants of Pol Pot's supporters are waging a guerrilla war against the Heng Samrin government that was installed by Vietnam last winter.

Arrangements for the senators' trip were made with the consent of the Vietnamese Embassy in Bangkok, and of Vietnam's acting foreign minister Nguyen Co Thach who is visiting Thailand.

Although aid programs have begun for the estimated 2 million people who face starvation, Phnom Penh continues publicly to refuse aid from agencies who also supply areas controlled by ousted Pol Pot.

In Washington, the State Department said no executive branch officials would be entering Cambodia despite the presence in Thailand of Richard Holbrooke, assistant secretary of state for Far Eastern affairs.

Spokesman Hodding Carter said the department was fearful of sending the "wrong signal" to the world about the U.S. view of the Heng Samrin government if Holbrooke were to visit. He said the three senators could handle the fact-finding aspects of the mission adequately.

Carter repeated the administration contention that neither the Heng Samrin government nor Pol Pot's is a legitimate representative of the Cambodian people.

Administration sources in Washington said the trip "represents a change in (Vietnamese) attitude which may prove to be significant" in opening the way for increased Western aid to Cambodia.

The sources said that although the West had been slow to respond to the magnitude of the problem in war-torn Cambodia, the key holdup to massive aid was Vietnam.

They said the Vietnamese, who occupy Cambodia, have employed a "brutal, cynical" approach: "The use of food as a weapon for political recognition" of the Heng Samrin government they installed in Phnom Penh."

Their proposed aid plan still is in what one source called a "theoretical stage," but it would involve supplies already being gathered in an international relief effort.

The International Red Cross and the U.N. Children's Fund run the program, which flies 15 tons daily from Bangkok to Phnom Penh. Some 10,400 tons of food are expected to arrive by sea by the end of the month.

Deposed Shah sick in NY, hospitalized for cancer tests

By ARTHUR EVERETT
Associated Press

NEW YORK — The deposed Shah of Iran, said to be suffering from cancer and a blocked bile duct, began a series of extensive tests in one of the world's top hospitals yesterday after U.S. officials gave him special permission to enter the country for medical treatment.

Shah Mohammed Reza Pahlavi, who will be 60 on Friday, was described as appearing weak and moving with a slow, shuffling gait when he arrived at LaGuardia Airport Monday night after a flight from his place of exile in Cuernavaca, Mexico.

Traveling with him were his wife, a retinue of personal bodyguards, and two Doberman pinscher guard dogs.

Responding to an unofficial description of the shah as gravely ill, a spokesman at New York Hospital-Cornell Medical Center said, "there is no truth to it at all."

However, a State Department source in Washington who asked not to be identified, said the shah's ailment already had been diagnosed as cancer and a blocked bile duct.

A source close to the shah, who also asked not to be identified, said the deposed ruler's condition had worsened about two weeks ago.

There was no comment on those statements by either the hospital or the shah's entourage.

"The Shah and members of his family are optimistic that the outstanding medical care available in the United States will diagnose his ailment and provide a cure," read a statement from the Shah's senior adviser, Robert F. Armao.

Eamon Brennan, a hospital vice president, said tests of the shah were begun during the day, and were expected to continue today. No word on his condition is expected until they are complete, he added.

"He'll undergo all the usual tests — blood, urine, radiology, but no one's being more specific than that," Brennan added.

Man dies on campus working on antenna

Richard F. Booth, 40, of Northampton died of a sudden cardiac arrest Monday while working on the WFCR radio antenna near the Army ROTC building on campus, UMass police yesterday said.

UMass police received a report of a medical emergency at 1:50 p.m. and said cardiopulmonary resuscitation was attempted, but Booth was announced dead on arrival at Cooley Dickinson Hospital in Northampton.

he claimed own and operate this country, lashing out at the oil monopolies, the agribusinesses, and the corporate powers. On the subject of inflation, young Kennedy referred to the Federal Reserve Board chairman's remark that the standard of living of the average American "has to decline if inflation is to be reduced." He then argued that this not be necessary, urging, "The sooner we face down the vested interests, the better it will be for plain, ordinary, far too vulnerable Americans." It is felt by many that this speech, preceding the president's, is what urged Carter to refer humorously to Sen. Kennedy's potential challenge.

One other thing that stood out at this ceremony was the array of dignitaries it attracted. From Galbraith to McNamara to McCormack to Rusk, to the newer breed of Sen. Paul Tsongas and Andrew Young and South Shore Congressman Brian Donnelly, all involved either historically or morally with the ideals of the New Frontier and Great Society eras. Presidents Nixon and Ford were not there. They were not invited.

Then there were the contemporary political adversaries, like Boston Mayor Kevin White, who sat on the platform, and his challenger State Sen. Joseph Timilty, who sat in the audience. There were Governor Edward J. King and Lt. Gov. Thomas P. O'Neill, III, sitting on the same stage. And then there was former governor Michael Dukakis, working the crowd, shaking hands, receiving compliments.

After the ceremony, the former governor was asked if he had heard of the current governor's cancelled trip to UMass last spring. "Yes, I don't know what you folks are up to, he doesn't seem to like you too much," cracked the "Duke." When asked if he planned to run for the Commonwealth's top position again, Dukakis said, "We'll see, I'd like to come out and see you people again some time."

But one can't deny the fact that this dedication ceremony, however much it was used by other forces, was held to honor one man. And perhaps the poem his children read, written by Stephen Spender, summed it up best: "The names of those who in their lives fought for life, Who wore at their heart's the fire's center...Born of the sun they traveled a short while towards the sun And left the vivid air signed with their humor."

Celtics success courtesy of Red

By JOHN HIMMELSTEIN
Special to the Collegian

The mere achievement of winning a few October games hardly constitutes greatness in an NBA team, but any keen observer of the hoop scene would surmise that the 1979-1980 Celtics are a much-improved ballclub. A major reason—the remarkable Arnold "Red" Auerbach.

Last season, the Celtics were a haggard, disorganized, beaten club. Team play was unheard of; they tried to make the pick-and-roll an extinct species in Boston.

Red knew what medicine the sick '79 Celtics needed and wrote his prescription. The addition of Larry Bird gave the Celts the power forward they've lacked since the departure of Paul Silas; Auerbach cleaned up the McAdoo mess by trading him to Detroit for potentially choice first-round picks; last year's acquisition of young Rick Robey gave Boston an aggressive, talented and hungry player.

The Celtics have lacked a "leader" type guard since JoJo White's prime. It remains to be seen whether or not Nate Archibald can be that man, but apparently Red's confidence in Archibald has paid off. In the young season, "the Skate" has operated the team like Marcus Welby performing an appendectomy. He has scored his share of points and more importantly, set up his teammates beautifully with dazzling passes.

The young players Red has drafted and touted—Jeff Judlins and Gerald Henderson—seem to be in the winning, Celtic-type mold. Just like, say, Satch Sanders and K.C. Jones were. Of course, it would be foolhardy to think they will ever attain those heights, but their potential as strong contributors remains.

No general manager in the history of the league has enjoyed the success Auerbach has. Thirteen NBA championships, fourteen Eastern Division titles and twenty-five playoff berths.

Granted, the man has made mistakes—Clarence Glover, Garfield Smith, Norm Cook, ad nauseam. Nevertheless, drafting Bill Russell, Tommy Heinsohn and K.C. Jones in the same year (1956) ranks as one of the master strokes of all time. In fact, during the Russell era (1956-1969), the Celts drafted well every year, despite eleven world championships guaranteeing low position in the drafting. A good example of this is when the Celtics drafted JoJo White, the best guard coming out of college in 1969, after having won a world championship.

So, Celtics fans, remember how fortunate we are to have such a mentor at the helm of our team.

Lynch of B.C. (5-7, 7-5, 6-4) but, then lost to the #1 seed in the tournament, Tina Bougas of Harvard (6-2, 6-1) who was the eventual winner of the singles. She played well enough in the consolations to win 2 matches before losing to Kim Colson of Mt. Holyoke.

Sally Fryberger won her first 2 matches versus Linda Duchaine of P.C. (6-4, 6-1) and Debby Lecoyer of U.N.H. (6-3, 6-3) before losing to Amy Skillbrand of Amherst.

The doubles teams were not so successful as they both lost in the first round. Troy and Goldberg lost to a team from Harvard (6-1, 6-2) and Tarbell and Noble lost to a pair from U.N.H. (6-4, 4-6, 4-6).

The next match for the netwomen is a makeup against B.C. on Wed. The matches will be played at home.

This weekend the women's crew will compete in the Hadley Hinley at Brunelle's Marina in South Hadley. Also competing in the race will be the crews from Amherst College, Smith College and Mt. Holyoke College. The race is to determine the Pleasant Valley Champion. This is the final race before the women lock up the boats for the winter season.

The championship eight finished 29th in the time of 16:31.0, a little over a minute behind the winner Princeton University. Two man John Wolff said about his boat performance: "We moved out well. We passed one boat (Harvard Business School). We rowed at 32 and brought it up the last couple hundred meters to a 35. People thought that they had rowed a good race, but we were disappointed with our placing. We were about 8-10 seconds off the pace we wanted."

The mixed eight event consisted of four men and four women plus a coxswain of either sex and is the only race of its kind in international competition. The UMass entry finished eighth in 17:29.8, about 57 seconds behind the winner Vesper's Boat Club. Among the oarsmen in this boat were varsity coach Al Flanders, freshmen coach Dave Kumlin, and women's coach K.C. Dietz.

The championship four finished 31st in the time of 19:29.8 in an event won by Yale. The UMass boat had not had much of an opportunity to row together. The seating was not set until a few days before the race. Also one of the two fours UMass has was being repaired so they had to trade off the use of the boat with the women.

Correction

In yesterday's story on the ski club, the list of club officers should have read as follows: Brad Cohen, president; Jim Chambers and Vernon Aisner, co-vice presidents; Roxanne Edwards and Mark Coyle, co-secretaries; Ken Silverstein and Steve Glaser, co-treasurers.

The UMass women's tennis team lost to a fine BU team and finished 18th in New Englands this past weekend.

Against Boston University they ran up against a team that features a group of mostly full scholarship athletes from states such as Florida and California where tennis is a year round religion. The final score was 7 to 0 with two of the matches being called because of darkness.

Coach John Beal lauded the play of Cris Carson who lost in three sets, Barbara Mills who also lost in the 3rd set, and the doubles team of Fran Troy and Beth Goldberg who were ahead in the 2nd set when it got just too dark to play any longer.

In the New Englands the singles players distinguished themselves but the doubles teams didn't perform up to the expectations of coach Beal. As it was the team, Sally Fryberger and Barbara Mills in the singles and the teams of Fran Troy-Beth Goldberg and Carolyn Tarbell-Beth Noble in the doubles, finished 18th out of about 30 teams.

The match, which was won by the women from Dartmouth, saw Barbara Mills win her first match against Kathy 51 year old New England Whaler Gordie Howe has returned to the National Hockey League for the first time since announcing his retirement from the Detroit Red Wings six seasons ago. (AP Laserphoto).

Mark Marchand

Ancient warrior

You've got to admit, he's certainly not you're average NHL hockey player. The guy who wears number nine and skates on the right wing for the new-to-the-NHL Hartford Whalers brings a touch of color and a set of impressive credentials to the just opened 79-80 season. This man is none other than ageless Gordie Howe who returns to the NHL after a six season leave of absence following his 1970 retirement from the Detroit Red Wings.

Born on March 31, 1928, the Canadian native brings his 51 years back into the NHL for one more try after a five-year stint in the WHA with the Houston Aeros and New England Whalers. He signed with the Whalers as a free-agent in June of 1977 where he stayed until the present day absorption of the Whalers into the NHL.

Anxious to see just how a 51 year-old man keeps up with today's fast-paced brand of hockey, I took in last Friday night's home opener for the Whalers at the Springfield Civic Center. The Whalers, on the whole, looked pretty good during their 6-3 win over the L.A. Kings. As for Gordie's performance, well, it wasn't the Gordie Howe who once led the NHL in scoring for four consecutive seasons. On the other hand, he wasn't a "post mortem puck patroller" as my distinguished colleague Steve Zack would have it. Howe, although he made it clear he wasn't going into the corners, notched two assists on the evening in addition to setting up some good plays with crisp passing.

Still, I think the holder of 1,809 (786 goals, 1,023 assist) carrer NHL points no longer belongs on an NHL playing surface. Trying to put an end to the 400 or so rumors about his retirement, I asked Howe after the game if he was going to call it quits.

"It's too darn early in the year to tell," said Howe. "I could stop playing tomorrow or I could continue to play next season; I just don't know."

Apparently, Gordie isn't ready to stop playing. This guy's as old as my father yet he insists on continuing to play in what could probably be the most dangerous professional sport around.

On his return to the NHL, Howe says that he really doesn't notice that much of a difference.

"A lot of the names are different," explained Howe. "There are some damn good players in this league regardless of what everyone says about the watering down of talent."

Sharing Howe's opinion was another of the Whaler's old-timers, center Andre Lacroix who returns to the NHL at the age of 38.

"The league is actually much faster now," said Lacroix after the game. "When I played here (67-71), there were a lot of older players in the league, that's sure changed now."

Getting back to the issue of Howe continuing to play, I honestly think he should retire before he gets himself seriously injured when some young, cocky defenseman disregards the unwritten "don't hit Gordie" rule and gives him a free trip up into the tenth row. Gordie Howe is still one of the most famous, recognizable names in the game of hockey. From his first season in 1950 till now, Gordie has put together a career that will probably go unparalleled. He should quit while he's ahead. Don't embarrass yourself or your teammates Gordie, hang those skates up.

B's acquire Flames' Lalonde

BOSTON (AP) — The Boston Bruins announced yesterday that they have acquired center Bobby Lalonde from the Atlanta Flames in time for him to play in last night's National Hockey league game against St. Louis.

The Bruins said the acquisition was for "future considerations." The team said Lalonde would be in a Boston uniform for the game against the Blues in St. Louis, wearing Number 19.

At 5-foot-5, Lalonde, who shoots left, is the smallest player in the NHL. His weight is listed as 155 pounds.

The Bruins said in a release that the team acquired him "to maintain the depth of the club," with center Dwight Foster sidelined at least one month after knee surgery.

Head of the Charles proves tough for crew teams

By ANDY BLUME

The fifteenth annual Head-of-the-Charles Regatta was held this past Sunday on the Charles River in Boston. The UMass men's crew team was represented in events in which the championship (varsity) eight finished 29th, the championship four 31st, the mixed eight 8th, and the youth eight 6th.

With the weather in the 80's, about 50,000 spectators showed up to watch this regatta, the largest of its kind in the world. The Head is a grueling three-mile upstream marathon that test the endurance of an oarsman and the steering ability of a coxswain. With a maximum of forty boats entered in each event, boats are started at intervals of 10 seconds and race against the clock.

The youth eight event, for oarsmen under the age of 20, saw a UMass boat come as close as they ever did to winning a medal. They finished sixth in the time of 16:34.3 (about 40 seconds behind the winner Cornell) against some of the top rowing schools in North America. The boat was mostly made up of last year's freshman eight that went undefeated during the regular season. It consisted of stroke Carlos Pena, seven man Steve Chipman, sixman Kavin Bloomer, five man Jim Rogalski, four man Kenny "Cuts" Jelalian, three man Scott Friedman, two man Joe Wolff, and bow man Kurt Kuehnel. Coxswain Marty Galss had this to say about the race: "We started off rowing about a 34 (strokes per minute). We rowed most of the race at a 31. The one boat we passed which we really wanted to pass was the Coast Guard Academy. The boat wasn't as smooth as it was in some of the practices preceding the race but we were very pleased with the results."

The UMass women's crew returned from Boston's Head-of-the-Charles Regatta dejected after a disappointing performance in the three-mile race. The UMass women's eight finished 29th while the women's four finished a poor 38th.

The women's four faced a great deal of difficulty in their race. At the two-mile point in the race the crew clashed with Wellesley crew to bring the UMass boat to a sluggish halt. This didn't inhibit the women from finishing the grueling race. "It's difficult to get composed after your boat is stopped dead in its tracks," explained the women's crew coach K.C. Dietz. The Lake Washington Rowing Club was the winner of the women's four with a time of 18:57.7.

The women's eight weren't able to maintain a solid pace throughout the race which contributed to their dismal performance. The crew from the University of Wisconsin won the race with a finishing time of 17:27. "For a three-mile race a team must be able to maintain a solid stroke throughout the race; otherwise, you suffer the consequences," said Dietz. "Also, we lost four members from last year's varsity squad, which has hurt us considerably."

"As always the competition was extremely tough in the races. I don't feel that I emphasized the importance of the fall season as much as I should have. In order for us to finish high in the field of forty we must do more endurance, leg, and weight training. This will prevent our team from conking out in longer races. The crew team will train all through the winter season mostly working out with weights to build up strength."

Just 10 minutes away...

By CAROL MORTON

Cross-country ski enthusiasts, or those interested in trying the sport, will only have to travel 10 minutes to ski free this winter in the Mill River Recreation Area.

Located on North Amherst bus route, the Mill River ski trail will be well lighted for late afternoon skiing on short winter days. Groomed snow on the ski trail will avoid the icy conditions common in the Valley.

Development of the trail is a joint project of the Amherst Recreation Department and the Amherst Nordic Ski Club.

Proceeds from the Cross-Country Ski Jamboree on Saturday, October 27, at the Amherst Junior High School Gym will help purchase snow grooming equipment for the ski trail. Fees from cross-country ski lessons and guided ski tours at the Mill River trail will contribute to maintenance costs at the ski facility.

The Ski Jamboree, from 1-5 p.m., will feature a ski swap, cross-country ski movies, waxing and ski maintenance clinics and off-season training clinics. Roller skiing will also be demonstrated at the Jamboree.

The Bill Koch Ski Club Van will have try-out equipment for children and their parents on synthetic "ski mats."

Persons wishing to sell outgrown or unwanted ski equipment should come early, starting at 10 a.m., to drop off sale items.

Admission tickets cost $1, and each ticket will serve as a chance on a raffle, with $700 in prizes by area merchants. The raffle-admission tickets can be purchased in the Campus Center Concourse at the Nordic Ski Club Jamboree table.

All proceeds will go for equipment for the Mill River Ski area.

Just a few months old, the Amherst Nordic Ski Club formed because of local interest in cross-country skiing.

"Anyone is welcome to join the club," said member Rose Paul. "We are trying to avoid the image of all expert skiers, so we welcome beginners."

"We already have a fleet of people who want to teach lessons," said Paul.

Ski club members will volunteer their services as instructors and tour-guides for the Mill River ski trail.

"Schedules for the lessons and tours will be out in January, when they start," Paul said. "We are still trying to get more organized."

"The Amherst Recreational Department released results of a survey which listed cross-country skiing as the fourth most popular leisure activity in Amherst area," said Paul. "We thought there would be enough interest for a club."

The new ski club already has about 200 members, said Art Allen, ski patroler at the Northfield cross-country ski area.

SGA reps appeal to trustees to regain student fund control

By BRIAN O'CONNELL
Collegian Staff

BOSTON—Student leaders attending the UMass Board of Trustee's meeting here yesterday expressed bitter disappointment over continuing administrative efforts to control University student funding policy.

Administrators announced in a memorandum three weeks ago plans to divide the Student Activities Trust Fund into rigidly separate categories. The memorandum is a reiteration of the Trustee Budget Summary released last June.

Calling the planned action of taking away student authority on student budgetary matters a "slap in the student's face," LaVoice said student leaders were unaware of the implications of the memorandum. The program states the Student Government Association does not have the right to reallocate funding, as they have in the past, according to LaVoice.

Vice-Chancellor of Administration and Finance George Beatty told committee members he "intended to change the Program Statement," and that "this year, I meant to do it (SATF Funding) differently." Beatty also said this year's Program Statement on SATF "is totally inflexible" to the Student Government Association, whereas previous Program Statements "were totally flexible."

Vice-Chancellor for Student Affairs Dennis L. Madson denied charges of no change in this year's SATF funding. He said there had been "a misunderstanding" on the part of Student Government members. "Although I am supportive of Student Government," Madson said, "operative issues should be handled by the admininstration."

University President David C. Knapp, who cited "a real gap of understanding" between students and administrators, said he would be willing to act as moderator between the two battling factions. "The present (SATF) Program Statement restricts student flexibility," he said. One trustee also expressed concern over the "adverse relationship" between campus leaders and the student government at UMass.

A meeting to discuss the issue is scheduled here Friday with Co-President LaVoice, Senate speaker David Barenberg and Vice-Chancellor's Beatty and Madson.

Knapp later commented on the UMass Library situation, saying it would be "foolhardy" to judge the possibilities of the tower reopening "until all the engineering tests are complete." Knapp said he expects the final results from the Bureau of Building Construction "in ten to fourteen days."

Knapp also said he "sympathized" with faculty and graduate students who do not have full access to the library. "It must be a hindrance to these students and faculty members, but they do have access to materials if needed.

Knapp added he was disappointed students couldn't "browse around and choose from a larger selection of materials" in newly-renovated Goodell.

Visitor's program negotiates toward Moshe Dayan appearance at UMass

By PAMELA LINDMARK
Collegian Staff

Moshe Dayan, 64, former Israeli foreign minister who four days ago submitted his resignation, may be slotted for a Nov. 16 paid appearance here, Distinguished Visitors Program vice-chairman Howard Goldman said last night.

Goldman said he received a phone call late Monday afternoon from the Leigh Bureau, a national speaking group presently scheduling a Nov. 16 to Dec. 10 tour for Dayan. Honorarium charges for the appearance would be $10,000. No total expense estimates have been made, Goldman said.

The appearance would probably be an exclusive in Massachusetts and the first in the nation, he said.

Appearance negotiations, to be completed or rejected by Friday, would settle sponsorship in conjunction with the Union Program Council in an effort to minimize costs to students, according to Goldman. Admission fees may be charged to finance the event if sponsored with UPC, he said. Outside guests would be admitted.

"DVP does not have the financial assets to bring this kind of speaker without charging students," Goldman said.

The final decision hinges on whether the program could be a "self-supporting" one, Goldman said. Questions over DVP—UPC sponsorship, Curry Hicks Cage availability for the program, and student support remain unanswered.

Dayan's speech topic is not known, though he is expected to voice his views on the Middle East situation and the present controversy on the West Bank decision.

Library declares overdues pardon

Amnesty will be granted to anyone returning overdue library materials, Virginia Tunnell of the UMass Main Library announced yesterday. Tunnell said no one will be charged the usual 25 cents per day, per book if their books are returned between today and the Halloween witching hour next Wednesday.

She said the library administration decided to grant the pardon because of problems closing the Main Library may have caused persons trying to return books.

The reprieve covers those who have yet to return materials to the Main Library, the Biological Sciences Library and the Physical Sciences Library. Excluded from the absolution are materials from the reserve libraries and the interlibrary loan.

House passes fuel aid for poor

BOSTON [AP] — A $25 million bill to help the poor pay their heating costs this winter was approved yesterday by the Massachusetts House and sent to the Senate.

The House action came on a voice vote without debate.

The bill includes $10 million in "up front" money which will be returned to the state treasury once Congress approves a fuel aid program for the poor.

Boston reveals N. Station plans

BOSTON [AP] — City officials yesterday unveiled an ambitious, $700-million renovation proposal for Boston's North Station area, including plans to open a new waterfront area by dredging a canal into the landlocked area.

Mayor Kevin White said the plan by architect Moshe Safdie "brings vision and creativity. . .to an area which has long represented a challenge to downtown development."

Carter plans aid; Kennedy critical

WASHINGTON [AP] — President Carter prepared yesterday to pledge $30 million to aid starving Cambodians, but Sen. Edward M. Kennedy accused the administration of moving too slowly and urged a massive airlift of food and medicine.

Little more than an hour before Carter planned to announce the details of the $30 million aid proposal, Kennedy told a Georgetown University audience that the money the president proposes to spend "is only a first installment compared to the need that now exists."

Flanked by secret service men, Rosalynn Carter yesterday shook the hands stretched out toward her from a crowd that lined Main Street in Newport, New Hampshire. The president's wife spent most of the day in similar campaigning, stopping in Claremont and Keene as well. (AP Laserphoto)

Illegal waste dumps hidden, endanger New England public

By MARGARET NELSON
Associated Press

NEW CASTLE, N.H. — Thousands of undiscovered chemical dumps across New England are individual time bombs that could explode at any time and cause drastic public health problems, according to experts on toxic waste.

In addition, experts said there still is no place in the Northeast to treat or store the estimated 300 million gallons of toxic wastes and by-products created every year by industries.

Philip Gidley of Exeter estimated as many as 2,000 illegal dumping grounds may be scattered throughout New England. That is 10 times as many as already have been found.

"It will cost hundreds of millions of dollars to clean up those problems," he said.

Gidley was one of the speakers Tuesday at the three-day Northeast Conference on Hazardous Wastes, which attracted environmentalists, engineers, planners, lawyers and industry representatives from around the Northeast. It was sponsored by the University of New Hampshire, the American Society for Environmental Education and a number of private companies.

Officials in Maine, Massachusetts and New Hampshire estimated the cost of cleaning up recently discovered dumps in those states could run more than $75 million — the states bearing much of the cost.

Despite the problems of illegal dumping, state and local planners noted that few communities are willing to allow private companies to build secure places to put the waste within their borders.

"I cannot paint a rosy future about being able to site (locate) future waste facilities in this area," said Peter Skinner, an engineer with the New York attorney general's office, speaking of the "Love Canal" chemical dump in his state. "People just don't want them."

Skinner suggested states should assume the responsibility for creating safe places to treat and dispose of chemicals generated by industry.

Other speakers outlined the new extensive role of the Environmental Protection Agency in policing industries that create the wastes.

But Gidley maintained that towns, not the federal or state governments, should be responsible for dealing with the byproducts of industrial development.

The town of Exeter plans to build a hazardous waste landfill for wastes from its own industries, Gidley said, but noted that industries in town agreed to pre-treat their own wastes.

Student co-ops barred from sales to University

By ED LEVINE
Collegian Staff

Student-run businesses may no longer sell products or services to any University department, because of a mandate apparently issued by Vice-Chancellor for Administration and Finance George Beatty.

Beatty refused yesterday to comment on the matter.

Although no official policy has been issued in writing by Beatty, the rental of equipment by the Union Video Center to the Continuing Education Department was vetoed Monday by the University.

Jessica Lamb, General Manager of UVC, said a purchase order from Continuing Education for the rental of videotape equipment was not allowed to be processed by the University procurement office. She said Tom Stalarski, Associate Director of Procurement, told her the action was in response to a directive from Beatty that University departments not do business with student co-ops. Stalarski would not talk about the situation when contacted yesterday.

"We've done business with the University for years and have never run into this," Lamb said, adding that UVC's allocation from the Student Senate only covers a portion of the costs. "We are mandated to earn part of our keep. Without outside business we will not survive," she said.

Dean of Students William F. Field said he had seen a draft of a memorandum from Beatty which banned purchases from student-operated businesses.

"It is a major issue about school businesses competing with local interests," Field said. "I can understand why some see this as unfair competition, but with UVC it doesn't make any sense. They have no local competition. Also, when the trustees were here last month, they ate at Earthfoods (a student-run restaurant), and I assume the money came from the trustee account," he said.

Field said he did not see a final copy of the memo, only the draft given him for his comments, by Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs, Dennis L. Madson.

Senate Speaker David Barenberg said Madson denied knowledge of any of these plans last week. "He said he did not know if anything has happened or was going to happen," Barenberg said.

Madson could not be reached for comment yesterday.

Rich LaVoice, Student Government Association co-president and student trustee said "It would be a very negative step for the university to take. They have no legal premise for doing this." He added the trustees had also deposited $40,000 in the student run credit union.

The policy of not purchasing from the co-ops was first proposed in March, 1978, by then Acting vice-Chancellor for Student Affairs Robert Woodbury. This policy, however, was never enacted and citing possible legal questions Woodbury suspended his action in May, 1978.

"The problem is between student government and vice chancellors Beatty and Madson," said University vice-President Bernice Braden. She said she will hold meetings with those involved on Friday in an attempt to settle the dispute.

Senate moves to retain student budget control

By JULIE EAGLE
Collegian Staff

With fervor and confidence, Undergraduate Student Senate leaders last night prompted numerous rounds of applause and won unanimous support of several motions calling for continued senate control of student funds.

Student Government Association co-President and Trustee Richard LaVoice and senate Speaker David Barenberg said the motions were necessary to protest recent UMass administrative actions. UMass administrators are supporting a UMass Board of Trustee mandate requiring a separation of the Student Activities Trust Fund into specific categories. Administrators also want student activities business records transferred to the University accounting system.

The senate voted "to aggressively attack this latest move by the administration to infringe on our student rights," according to one motion. Another motion called for "printing up to 10,000 leaflets to be passed out to all students to explain...what the administration is trying to do."

The senate voted "to call a public student meeting in front of Goodell to make students aware of what is going on and a create a high morale to protect our trust fund." A fourth motion called for establishing "a systems review task force in order to investigate ways of improving the present Recognized Student Organization accounting system."

The senate also supported an investigation into the performance of acting RSO Director O.C. Bobby Daniels and RSO Business Manager Leslie Bridges.

Evangelist George "Jed" Smock, asking students to repent and accept Jesus Christ as their Savior, made an unannounced visit yesterday to the UMass campus and spoke throughout the day to the entertainment of crowds sometimes exceeding 100 people.

Smock's speech, which began around 11:00 a.m. outside the southside of the Student Union, continued beyond 4 p.m., according to those present. Audience laughter and jeers mingled with occasional applause during the speech.

Smock, who is from Terre Haute, Indiana, recalled his past and described how he has changed since he turned to the "guidance of Jesus Christ."

Following his presentation, he distributed pamphlets detailing his life to students. The pamphlets said Smock is now a person who "seeks wisdom, believes in peace and freedom," and the "peace of God."

He said he was a drug addict, revolutionary, and a vagabond who returned to the United States after spending time in Southern Morocco. He said he returned with "...the word of God becoming a light to my feet and a lamp to my path as I read the Bible almost every day."

Smock said he believes he has been called to preach the gospel of the Lord.

An unidentified student, while listening to Smock's presentation, exclaimed, "This guy is incredible."

On the chow line — DC ladies

Joyce Matuszko

Editor's Note: This is the second in a three-part series on working women at UMass.

By DONNA SULLIVAN
Collegian Staff

One group of employees that most UMass students literally could not live without are the women who cook and serve meals in the dining commons—"DC ladies." From early morning until evening, from grilling the first piece of toast to wiping up the last drop of split milk, they are working in the buildings students seek out at mealtime.

About 50 women work in Hampshire Dining Commons, either cooking meals or serving them upstairs on the line. They are divided into two shifts—about 20 on the 6:30-2:30 a.m. shift, and 30 on the 11:30-7:30 p.m. shift.

"We earn our money," one worker said. Another, Helen Houghtaling, agreed, saying, "from the minute we punch in, we are working until we punch out at night."

According to Toots Fydenkevez, night shift supervisor, the women rotate jobs, working downstairs on food preparation for four weeks then upstairs serving for three.

While downstairs, women ready desserts for serving, prepare salads, slice bread and prepare many of the other foods served daily in the dining commons.

According to Houghtaling, women serve food while on the line, and clean ovens, utensils, and tables later.

Women make up half or more of the cooking force in the dining commons. Head cook Joyce Matuszko prepares, cooks, and slices foods, and oversees the entire meal.

One woman taking meal tickets keeps track of how many 10-, 14-, and 19-mealplan tickets she takes. This starts the process of computing how much food to prepare the following week.

Goldman, who said he anticipated controversy over the appearance, is working though DVP to schedule a Palestinian Liberation Organization speaker for the following week—"to represent their side," he said.

"We would like opinions, input," said Goldman. "If there really is that much objection, we cannot bring him."

DVP sponsored last month's controversial Jane Fonda/Tom Hayden appearance, which drew a capacity crowd of 4,200. Total costs, Goldman said, were under $7,000, financed by $1 admission charges and in part by previously allotted DVP budget.

Abortion: Jews place mother's needs first

By ANNE MERCIER
Collegian Staff

No unified decision regarding abortion exists today in Jewsih tradition, according to Rabbi Saul Perlmutter, a member of the B'nai Brith Hillel organization, located in the Student Union.

There is, however, "universal agreement" he said, "over the extremely important issue of the health of the mother."

"All Rabbis agree that the right to life refers to the mother's life. If it is a question of her life being in danger, an abortion is in order. It is positively permissible," Perlmutter said.

Many people who have looked to traditional Jewish sources agree that the criteria for abortion should include the mental health, as well as the physical health, of the mother. In cases of rape or incest, or if Down's Syndrome is likely, an abortion might be recommended, Perlmutter said.

"In the first 40 days of pregnancy, the fetus is not considered a full life, and considerations (of abortion) are less strict than in later days of pregnancy," he said.

"It is still a serious issue...and the underlying value is the sanctity of human life," he added.

The Orthodox, Conservative and Reformed interpretations of Judaism set up slightly different guidelines for abortion. But Perlmutter said all three branches agree on three criteria: the mother's life is of paramount importance, abortion is a less critical consideration during the first 40 days of pregnancy, and during this period, abortion is not considered murder.

No one representing traditional Jewish sources can say categorically that abortion is right, according to Perlmutter. "In every case, all kinds of factors are taken into consideration," he said.

"I don't know if I could get an abortion," said one Jewish woman student, who wished not to be named. "But a woman who feels it that it would be better for her life, should have that choice. It is the mother's choice, but it should not be considered as a method of birth control."

In regard to birth control methods, Perlmutter said Orthodix Jews approved of oral contraceptives before the side effects were known. The basis of this belief, he said, was Biblical passages which say that sperm is not to be destroyed as would be the case with some other forms of contraception. Other methods of birth control would be accepted if the pill was deleterious to a woman's health, Perlmutter said. Non-orthodox Jewish authorities do consider other methods of birth control acceptable, he said.

Editorial/Opinion

Field asks Weissman: Paper clips to millions?

William F. Field

I am pleased that Joel Weissman emerged from the shadow of columnist Bagli in his letter of Monday, October 15th as a spokesperson for the central SGA establishment. As part of the adminstrative/political structure under Speaker of the Senate Barenberg and former speaker, DeLima, Mr. Weissman is well qualified to represent it. He and I are in agreement on the basic nature of the problem although I differ with him on the solution.

In Mr. Weissman's words, "We know about the past corruption in SGA too. We detest the corruption...(we will) clear up our house through a strong and functional Attorney General's office..."

As Mr. Weissman well knows, the Attorney General is appointed and may be removed at any time by the very agencies he or she is called upon to investigate. Only last spring, the Student Senate removed from office, without trial, the Attorney General who was conducting an investigation of the Speaker of that Senate. Mr. Weissman seems not to have learned the lesson of Nixon's Watergate, but seems determined to repeat it.

Mr. Weissman's protestations of purity might be more convincing were he to move immediately to establish a board of students and faculty totally removed from Senate political and economic control who would be responsible for maintaining the necessary autonomy and independence of the Attorney General. In the absence of such a move, which would address the heart of the problem, empty statements about "cleaning up" student government serve only as a smoke screen to obscure further corruption.

Mr. Weissman also fails to support action which would ensure the existence of the other traditional check on government behavior, a free and independent press. Only last year, the Student Senate voted to deny funding for a time to The Collegian unless the newspaper agreed to let the Senate make certain editorial decisions on the allocation of space in the paper. Is it any wonder that The Collegian, which must go to the Senate with its hat in its hand every year, is reluctant to probe too deeply into the affairs of student government?

Mr. Weissman further proposes to "clean up our house through the elimination of petty excesses and patronage". He makes it sound as though someone is stealing pencils or paper clips or appointing their roommate to help with a few hours of filing.

This is not quite the impression one gets from a simple examination of the payroll record for the month ending October4, 1979. Senate projects were being carried out by some 40 non-student employees with some 595 students listed as eligible for weekly pay on these activities. The total earned for the last week in September was $13,654 and for the Summer and the first month of school year the total expeneded exceeded $95,000.

Mr. Weissman would also have us believe that the thievery he so readily acknowledges is part of the dim and distant past. He fails to mention that countless positions of authority within the SGA are filled today by the very same students and staff who stood idly by while the spectacular corruption of last year and the year before and the year before that was carried out. He fails to mention the recent audit of the Student Cooperative Record Store, which revealed that $20,000 which went through the manager's hands was never seen again.

The plain fact is that it is impossible to see corruption while it is occurring without strong accounting and management controls. The system which allowed corruption in the past is the same system Mr. Weissman defends today. It is the very magnitude of the SGA budget that demands independent and publicly verifiable records which currently exist in only the most primitive form. The Student Activities Tax, paid by students, amounts to some $1,470,000.

The total volume of money passing though the accounts amounts to millions more.

It is not an act of hostility to publicly wonder where the money goes, how the spending decisions are made, or for what purpose a large stable of student bureaucrats is maintained. I have no desire to suppress student government—indeed, a student government which enjoys the firm support of the students has no fear of suppression.

But I see no reason why student government should not be required to follow the same record keeping and personnel policies they demand of other departments of the University.

Raped society

Justice is just another word for a scapegoat in Boston

Charlie Bagli

Rape is a very powerful issue in our society. This kind of violence against women strikes in every neighborhood, in every part of town. Rape is also a very complicated issue in a society drenched in discrimination and inequality.

Right now Willie Saunders, a black painter employed in Brighton, is undergoing pre-trial hearings for the rape of four women. Willie Saunders' case is indicative of the problems between the women's movement and the black movement, as well as indicating something about justice in this country.

☆ At the time of his arrest, Willie Saunders' picture was shown on TV and in newspapers throughout the city. The police and press announced they had a positive I.D. when in fact they had none.

☆ Four of the women made some sort of identification. Even the prosecution admits two of these I.D.'s are weak, and the defense has evidence that some of the women were encouraged to identify Willie Saunders.

☆ While Willie Saunders was in Charles Street jail, another very similar rape occurred. Police and prosecution have chosen to ignore this.

☆ So far, two judges have disqualified themselves from the case for being racist, but only after making crucial rulings against Willie Saunders.

So in the city torn apart for the last five years by racist violence Willie Saunders is framed. The people of Brighton are terrified by a rapist and the first black man that comes along is arrested. In a last April 4th's issue of the Boston Globe it's made clear that this is typical of Massachusetts justice.

From November 1978 to January 1979 eight rapes were committed under very similar circumstances in the Brighton section of Boston. Brighton is inhabited by an uneasy alliance of working class people, students from Boston University, and retired citizens. When I lived there it was always thought of as a "safe place." Yet, even here, women are not safe from the violence of rape.

An angry community demanded action. The police took out a warrant for the arrest of Willie Saunders on December 28, 1978. A month later, February 1, 1979, a community meeting of 750 people in Allston—Brighton demanded an arrest. It was during this meeting, a full month later, that Willie Saunders was finally picked up.

Mr. Saunders has been a resident of Roxbury—Dorchester since 1967. He had worked in a building where three of the rapes occurred. One of the women was raped in a building managed by Sanders' employer. In looking for a suspect the police asked the building management if they employed any black men. They gave the police Willie Saunders' name.

The justice system that arrested Willie Saunders conducted a fascinating investigation that led to Willie's arrest.

☆ Fingerprints found at the scene of a January 1, 1979, rape were put through a paper shredder by the police. They claimed they were irrelevent and useless to this case.

☆ Willie Saunders differs from the description of the rapist in significant ways. He is 39 years old and has a smooth complexion. The rapist was commonly described as being 25-35 years old, with a pock-marked face and a Jamaican accent.

Willie Saunders.

So in the city torn apart for the last five years by racist violence Willie Saunders is framed. The people of Brighton are terrified by a rapist and the first black man that comes along is arrested. In last April 4th's issue of the Boston Globe it's made clear that this is typical of Massachusetts justice.

It is within this context that the women's community fights rape. The police have no regard for the victims of rape or the terror that it strikes in the neighborhoods. Rather than taking the necessary steps to catch the real rapist, they have "closed the case" by scapegoating Willie Saunders. The women of Brighton are still in danger. Again, this is typical of "justice" in Boston and elsewhere—the police don't deal with the problems of the rape victims, but more often intimidate and humiliate those women who press charges.

The complicating factor is that all too often in the case of a white woman's rape, black men stand accused. Much more than half the men convicted of rape are working class black men. And far too many of their cases are similar to the frame-up of Willie Saunders.

Prosecuting Willie Saunders does nothing to solve the problems of violence against women in Boston.

Fortunately, in the racially torn city of Boston, Willie Saunders' family, coworkers, women from "Take Back the Night", and community people; black and white, men and women have struggled through the complexity of the issue to give him support.

In this section of Boston where people are coming together, there is a flicker of hope.

Mr. Elnabi: Who's the 'we'?

To the Editor

In response to Mr. Elnabi's articles of 10/22/79 and 10/23/79 entitled "U.S. Must Deal with PLO" and "Palestinians Prefer Peace," we applaud Mr. Elnabi's desire for peaceful coexistence between Jew and Palestinian in the Middle East. We feel that Mr. Elnabi's article is quite progressive in lieu of the fact that he calls for statehood and self-determination for both Jew and Palestinian alike.

However what Mr. Elnabi fails to point out is that his own views and the views expressed by the PLO are totally different. As Mr. Elnabi calls for a two-state solution, thereby guaranteeing rights for all peoples of the area, the PLO explicitly states that Israel has no right to exist. Mr. Elnabi sees a need to be historically specific when he says "in the process of creating the state of Israel fundamental injustice was done to the Palestinian people...the loss of their homes and lands."

What Mr. Elnabi neglects to point out, however, is that the original UN Partition of Palestine into Jewish and Palestinian states was accepted by the Jews but totally rejected by the Arabs.

We must then ask, who is really the intransigent in the situation? Is it Israel, which refuses to deal with an organization [i.e. the PLO] that is committed to Israel's destruction? Or is it the PLO that is intransigent, in refusing to simply recognize Israel's right to exist, in exchange for a PEACEFUL solution to the Palestinian problem?

Mr. Elnabi, in his articles, often used pronouns such as "we," and "our" thereby implying that he is speaking for some larger group. In fact, he doesn't identify who "we" are, and the "we" is certainly not the PLO. Yet, Mr. Elnabi asks the US government and Israel to negotiate with the PLO, in spite of PLO refusal to simply recognize Israel.

Mr. Elnabi claims that US policy regarding the Palestinians is "timid and uncertain." On the contrary, US policy regarding Palestinian rights has always been very supportive. The US denies, however, the legitamacy of the PLO's aim to destroy the Jewish State.

While we agree with Mr. Elnabi's view of a two-state solution, we must sharply condemn the ideology and actions of the PLO. Furthermore, we support the US and Israeli policies of refusing to deal with the PLO until the PLO recognizes Israel's right to exist.

Mr. Moran shows 'ignorance'

To the Editor:

Mark Moran's 10/23 letter, entitled " 'New morality' proposed for..." is a remarkably ineffective caricature in which the writer exhibits colossal ignorance.

I find it difficult to extract a serious opinion from his hyperbole, but conjecture that he believes that sex education leads to sexual experimentation. He is not quoting from the doctrine of Catholicism, but is stating his opinion.

He obviously believes that sexual information is best left under lock and key, thus leaving children totally unaware and open to false and dangerous material in their quest for information that so intimately affects them.

Mr. Moran publicly advocates ignorance, but at least he is true to his beliefs.

Kate Busch

★ Senate

"The administration is walking on us," LaVoice said. "We have always set policy and now Bobby Daniels is trying to run the show. It's a total slap in the face. He's saying because he's so experienced, he should be setting the policies. I say that's a bunch of bull. All we students can set policy better than any one man in office."

"The time for aggressive action and united student movement is needed to organize an...attack," against administrators aiming to control student funds, Senator Michael Ferrigno said.

Referring to a recent statement by Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs Dennis L. Madson that the SATF is "state money...and we (administrators) are obligated to administrate this money," Senator Peter Egan said, "It's not state money—it's student money. When he (Madson) says it's state money, that reeks to me of fascism."

Another administrative move to control student funds, Barenberg told the senate, involves a recent verbal mandate from Vice-Chancellor for administration and Finance George Beatty to Director of Procurement Jake Bishop prohibiting University departments from buying goods from student-run cooperative businesses.

"The cooperatives are being attacked in a pretty arbitrary manner. It's taken a number of years to build up the cooperative system," Barenberg said. The administration was talking about bringing in a commercial bank into the Campus Center and otherwise destroying all the work cooperatives were doing."

John Szewczyk, chairperson of the Cooperative Collective, a campus organization of student-run businesses, said, "As a member of the Cooperative Collective, I'd like to say it's about time we begin this struggle" to maintain senate control of student funds.

How you can change the world in 25 years or less.

Let's face it.
In 25 years or less, the world of energy as you know it, will be entirely different.
So will we.
Today, we're a leader in the petroleum industry. And tomorrow, when your children are grown, we hope to be meeting their energy needs as well.
We've committed 90 million dollars this year alone to research and development programs that read like science fiction.
We're into earth sciences. Mining and milling uranium. Solar research. Geothermal energy development. Even new technology to produce fuel from coal; and synthetic crude oil from tar sands and oil shale.
And all the while, we're still looking for ways to squeeze every drop out of old oil fields. And continuing the important search world-wide for new ones.
If you're also committed to changing the world, to making your mark on the energy frontiers ahead, we'd like to talk to you.

Wanted: Minutemen spectators

By MAUREEN SULLIVAN
Collegian Staff

Ever kick a can off a mountaintop? An empty can, especially. As it bounds off the side, ever listen to the can, the sound it makes? First, a loud, but hollow clink, then the can runs down, echoing all the fainter, until all that is heard is a glassy, nearly inaudible "clink".

What has this got to do with sports? Easy. Apply a can to almost every sport here on campus, and you have the kind of spirit audiences usually exert—loud but empty, and growing dimmer as the game winds down.

Also, if one replaces a can with say, a basketball or a volleyball, and the same empty, echoing sound can be duplicated during a game at the Cage or NOPE gym; the ball bounces off the floor and can be heard all over the stands—the sparsely-populated stands.

OK, I'll get rid of those who study for innumerable amounts of midterms. Let's see—that still leaves about 10,000 of you milling around, somewhere. Going home for the weekend? That's another thousands off the lists. Coming here for the weekend? Add about five hundred. Really don't give a damn about UMass sports in general? Why are you reading this anyway? Go to the comics section—I think it's on page 13 today.

Forgive my fascination with numbers, but that's what makes professional sport go 'round, and college sport doesn't exactly hide their appreciation for good crowds.

Yes, give me a good 105,000 people in the Rose Bowl, and I'll give you a commercial about the school's scholastic goods. The crowds are real, not just orange and blue dots painted on your TV screen; they scream "Go, team, go!" and all that. Really!

Then, I look at Alumni Stadium on a typical autumn afternoon; I walk by the Cage on the way to a volleyball match at NOPE.

In all these places, I can hear that tin can being kicked off the mountain...

Is it that UMass teams are so good, they don't need crowds to back them up, even when the Minutemen (women) are behind with seconds left? Is it that UMass doesn't produce exciting teams, full of the vibrancy and legendary moves that make memories for generations to come (for example, how many of you remember Knute Rockne? OK. How about the football coach before Pickett? Or the play that put Dennis Dent over the 1,000 yard mark?)? Or is it that there's so much going on during a Saturday afternoon, you can't decide whether to see the football game or the soccer game at Boyden, so you decide on the Texas-Baylor game on TV?

Speaking of TV, I think that's what's keeping people away. We're not from Ohio State or Michigan, and ABC decides not to cover UMass, a good football team with a small stadium. The same goes for field hockey, cross country, and soccer; despite every good intention to become champions, most national media organizations grab up the sure ad dollars they get from football and basketball, and tend to ignore just about everything else, unless an individual sparks a program alive with personal glamour and achievement. No achiever, no crowd; why bother? People in this spectator society tend to agree with this: no media hype, no "Hi, Mom, send money!" signs for all to see, no attendance.

What about the crowds that do come, despite the lack of Al Michaels? They yell, they boo, they clap, they leave. In a way, an eerie quiet looms uneasily over these people; again, that tin can rolls along, echoing into a fade.

How about it, you 10,000 or so? If you can't support your teams, at least support the crowd! Let's keep that tin can on the mountaintop!

"I was very happy with their performance," said Niemiec. "Our team worked as a team...by talking to each other in the field of play and working to settle passes. Also, it was great to get all my players into the game and see them get playing time."

Today, UMass/Amherst will face off against UMass/Boston in front of Boyden at 3:00. "I expect a good contest from them even though they have a relatively new squad," said Niemiec.

Dan Guidera, Mark Marchand, Steve Zack, George O'Brien. Four good ways to keep abreast of campus and pro sports.

Spikers grab two matches at Bridgeport

By MAUREEN SULLIVAN
Collegian Staff

The women's volleyball team held on to defeat Sacred Heart 15-11, 15-8 and coasted over the University of Bridgeport 15-6, 15-3 Tuesday night in Bridgeport.

Playing Sacred Heart first, the Minutewomen had problems timing their blocks, according to assistant coach Al Morel. Sacred Heart had set so far away from the net, UMass couldn't anticipate when the ball would come to their side, so they put up blocks too soon or too late.

"However," said Morel, "our passing was excellent; Peggy Barber did a super job getting the ball just where we wanted it. Also, Chris Kelly came in to do a great job setting. Our overall play was decent; even though we were a little flat, we played well enough to win."

Against Bridgeport, UMass totally dominated the entire match. "Alison Taylor hit everything Bridgeport had to offer," said Morel, "she was great as a middle hitter. Bridgeport was a better squad than Sacred Heart, but the team just blew them away. We can't lose to Division Two teams like Williams anymore this season. If we do, that lessens our chance of being invited to the Regionals next month. Every match is important now."

UMass travels to Mount Holyoke tonight for a 7:30 match. The JVs square off at 6:00.

JV booters rout Holyoke

By JAY BRIGHTMAN
Collegian Staff

The men's JV soccer team extended their record to 5-0-1 by beating Holyoke at Holyoke Tuesday afternoon by the score of 4-1. Holyoke brought a depraved 2-6 record into the game.

The Minutemen opened the scoring six minutes into the game as right winger John Brigham passed to a streaking Bob Boyd who proceeded to put the ball in the open net. Thirty-five minutes later Gus Martins dribbled the ball around his defender and passed off to Mike Jenkins who booted the ball into the left corner to increase the lead to 2-0. Within two minutes UMass wing fullback Joe Bortolotti moved up from his defensive position and booted a slicing 20-yard drive by the defending goaltender, which ended the scoring for the first half.

The Minutemen continued to pressure the Holyoke CC goalie in the second half scoring six minutes into the half to finish off the scoring for UMass. The goal was scored as Jenkins booted Dave Bernstein's rebounding shot into the undefended Holyoke CC net. Jenkins, a sophomore transfer student from Keene St. in N.H., is the leading scorer for the team with 5 goals and 2 assists. "Jenkins is a steady player with a good knack around the net," remarked Coach Ed Niemiec.

Holyoke CC broke the shut out ten minutes later when Mike Nihill beat his man and passed to Mark Simons for the goal which accounted for the final score.

Losers unite

It is often easy for people to jump on the bandwagon when a team is riding high on a winning streak or steadfastly entrenched in first place. But when a team begins to pull an "el foldo" act and falls from the grace of its admirers, it is the true diehard fan that refuses to deal with the losing, and look for the few bright spots that can occur during a long season.

I should know because I have been a Kansas City Chiefs fan since 1971. Last week's fumble against the New York Giants (whose fans are in the same boat I am) did not surprise me in the least. Oh, I'll admit that I kicked in a plaster wall in the Collegian hallway upon hearing what had happened, but quickly I rationalized to myself that it was probably part of the Kansas City game plan.

Now I must admit that I share a benefit that many fans of losing teams do not; my team, the Chiefs, at least won a championship in this decade. I sit back and think of the misfortune and degredation of fans who support teams like the Giants, the New York Mets, the Minnesota North Stars, etc.

New York Giants fans have had to suffer the most disappointment throughout the years. Remember Rocky Thompson? Giants fans don't or at least don't want to. The poor Giants fans even have to go across the border into New Jersey to see the New York team play.

Mets fans are a special breed. They put up with ineptness, no power, and no talent. Look at what the Mets have traded away and picked up along the past few years. Gone from the grasp of the Big Apple are such notables as Nolan Ryan, Rusty Staub, Dave Kingman, Tim Foli, and Tom Seaver, And look what the Mets have gotten in return. The New Yorkers have gotten the likes of Frank "I can't field worth a damn" Taveras, just to drop a name.

Hockey afficionados up in the state of Minnesota have the pleasure of watching the North Stars, double-runners and all, scamper about the ice in any direction other than that of the opposing goalie. Who can forget the illustrious netminding duo of Gump Worsely and Cesare Maniago. By the end of his career, Worsely's reaction time had slipped to the negative side and Maniago, a 6'5" goalie, did everything but that—stand up.

I could not go without mentioning the Atlanta Braves, total mediocrity. But then, what could you expect from a Ted Turner owned franchise. Having to play in a band box like Fulton County Stadium is certainly no joy. Actually, I should offer no lament for Braves fans due to the fact that there aren't any to begin with. People that you see in the stands for Braves games are holdovers from the Atlanta Falcons previous football season who fell asleep and didn't wake up until the PA announcer blared out that Phil Neikro was warming up in the bullpen.

The Braves are a great example of why interleague play has not yet arrived. Imagine if by some fluke of the scheduling office the Braves were matched up to play the Oakland Triple A's. Charlie Finley could sit alone on one side of the stadium, Ted Turner could have the other side to himself and they could throw paper airplanes at each other made out of $100 bills, while on the field spasticity reigned supreme.

Fans of the former New Orleans, now Utah Jazz have been singing the blues ever since this team came into existence. For a bit of a brain teaser, name five players who are now playing or have played for the team.

Those of you who came up with the name of Otto Moore are entitled to a rare photo of Bernard King singing with the Mormon Tabernacle Choir.

So, fellow fans of morbid teams, I offer you these parting words: It is better to have tried and lost, than to have your team crucified during the playoffs by Howard Cosell, Joe Garagiola, or Brent Musberger.

Carter: Tricks or tax for oil industry

By JAMES GERSTENZANG
Associated Press Writer

WASHINGTON — President Carter said yesterday he may pursue proposals to punish the oil industry if Congress fails to produce a satisfactory "windfall profits" tax.

Carter's comments were echoed by New Jersey Gov. Brendan Byrne, who was accompanying the president on an afternoon trip to New Jersey for an energy forum and a Democratic Party fund-raiser.

In the president's first public comments on third quarter profits announced by the major oil companies, Carter said the figures "vividly demonstrate the need for a major portion of unearned profits from the oil companies to go into the general service of the American people."

Carter made the remarks at a White House breakfast meeting with the National Citizens' Coalition for the Windfall Profits Tax.

Actually, the tax that Carter proposed last spring would be applied to the oil industry's increased revenue, stemming from his decision to phase out crude oil price controls.

Carter said that if the Senate fails to pass a bill stronger than the one before the Finance Committee, "We will shift our combat zone" to the House-Senate conference. That panel will work out differences between the Senate bill and a bill the House has approved, which is more to Carter's liking.

The tax approved by the Senate committee would produce $142 billion from 1980 to 1990, compared with $292 billion in Carter's original proposal and $273 billion in the House-passed bill.

If the final measure does not meet his approval, Carter said, "We'll move toward additional proposals to the Congress which could be quite punitive to the oil industry.

"I will not hesitate to do that if necessary," the president said. He did not spell out what steps would be taken.

Byrne, the coalition chairman, said later that some of the group's members suggested nationalization of the oil industry or reimposition of price controls "may be appropriate."

The governor said he felt such sentiments reflected consumer restlessness and "a sense of frustration."

Freshman:

Why are many leaving?

By JENNIFER YODER
Collegian Staff

Why did one out of every five freshmen drop out last year? The University doesn't know—and is getting nervous.

According to Dierdre Kedesdy, director of admissions, concern for keeping students at UMass is a result of forecasts by admissions statisticians that UMass will soon be suffering from a decline in enrollment. The decline results from lower birth rates and the economic instability of the country.

"It is the feeling among statisticians and demographers that the number of college-going people reached a peak last year. The number is expected to decline until 1992—the pattern of the drop and the rate at which the drop will occur is unknown," Kedesdy said.

Statistics show that of the 4,641 freshmen who enrolled last year, more than 900 dropped out. These statistics, however, are no worse than those at any other school.

"With the decline of the college-age population it's necessary to institute sound retention policies. Colleges across the country have been feeling this need for retention. We, at UMass, want to find ways to keep the students here; a retention play will not only help to maintain a stable enrollment, but will also help us to find better ways to help students," Kedesdy said.

The director of the Student Development and Counseling Center, Sally Freeman, said the University's objective is to reach the student who "might have stayed."

"We in the Student Affairs Office, are looking at things systematically; retention has always been the idea behind our services. The reason for the awareness this year is that the University has finished its growth stage and is now 'looking inward' to see what we might be doing to improve the quality of the action already being taken," Freeman said.

Student Affairs has recently developed a divisional committee on retention to research the quality of the agency's services.

Among the services offered by Student Affairs, Freeman said, are career development counseling workshops, which cover study skills, time management, exam pressures, self awareness and relaxation. Last year, more than 2,000 students used these workshops.

Jim Shaw, associated dean and director of CASIAC, said he is exploring the possibilities of working through the Rhetoric Program and upgrading the January admissions orientation in an effort to reach freshmen.

"We must do what we can to reach the lost feshmen—we need to find them,

Boys and ghouls it's ghost and goblin time!

By PAUL BANKS

For Judi White, a sophomore, this weekend is a time to be out and about. "It's the only night that everyone really lets loose. People you wouldn't think dress up, do," she said. For another student this weekend means something different. "I plan on going home to avoid the massive confusion that invades this University," she said.

According to Colliers Encyclopedia, Holloween, or "All Hallows Eve", is so called because it is the eve of All Saints Day. People called the Druids believed Halloween was the "Day of Samen", when the "Lord of Death" calls together the "souls of the wicked" who have died during the past year.

In years past, the weekend preceding Halloween has been a time when the UMass campus comes alive with activity. Many students dress up in any imaginable costume. Scarecrows, witches, tramps, devils, pumpkin heads, walking grapes, meal books, werewolves, coneheads, Frankensteins, and a variety of ghouls and gobblins have all been seen roaming the UMass grounds.

Providing the weather is fair, this year should be something like last, when students ventured out of their dorms into a night of unknown adventure.

People paraded around in clusters all over campus, visiting other parties and other residences. A definite stop for many students is the Campus Center, which serves as a meeting place for everyone to come and see each other's costume. Last year there were students from wall to wall of the center for about two hours.

There are rumors that the center will be closed this weekend, but the Scheduling Office reports this is not true. The center will be open.

People will be coming not only from UMass to the campus, but from elsewhere as well. "Some friends are coming down from Boston because they know UMass is a good time during Halloween weekend," Serena Richard, a junior, said.

Besides the entertainment this weekend at various parties on campus , there are many more optional activities.

Tonight, at the Blue Wall, NRBQ is playing, and tomorrow night the Reprise will be featured.

There are also several movies one could see. "When A Stranger Calls", alongside "Time After Time," are playing at the Hampshire Mall, and Monty Python's "Life Of Brian" is playing at the Mountain Farms Mall.

For the second year in a row the popular "Rocky Horror Picture Show" is making an appearance at a local theater. Tonight and tomorrow night at 12 p.m., it is playing at the Hampshire Mall. If Rocky Horror's following is as strong as a year ago, the theater will be flooded with students, some of them in costume.

Another movie tonight is Andy Warhol's "Frankenstein," playing at 7, 9, and 11 in the Campus Center Auditorium. Admission with costume is $1.00, for those without, $1.25.

Tomorrow night there are two costume parties scheduled, and prizes for best costumes will be awarded at each. Live entertainment, together with beer and dancing is scheduled to begin at the Newman Center at 8 p.m., while festivities at the Hampden Student Center begin at 9:30 p.m., with the Martian Highway Band performing.

October 31, Halloween, the original "Night of the Living Dead" is playing in the Student Union Ballroom at 7, 9, and 11 p.m. For those who enjoy bodies flying and creatures eating people, it should be great fun.

Yippie pies Jerry

NEW YORK (AP) — California Gov. Edmund G. Brown Jr. was hit on the side of the head with a lemon-coconut pie yesterday as he entered Cooper Union to address several hundred students.

The assailant was Yippie Aron Kay, who habitually uses a pie-in-the-face as a way of showing displeasure with a person.

In this case, he said without amplification that Brown, a Democrat who is expected to announce his candidacy for president, was "not doing anything for the prison system and prisoners in California."

Boy admits Amherst rapes

NORTHAMPTON, Mass. (AP) — A 14-year-old boy has admitted that he raped two women in Amherst last March while he was living in a foster home in Belchertown, Hampshire-Franklin County District Attorney Thomas Simons has said.

The boy's name wasn't released because of state laws protecting a juvenile's identity.

According to published reports, the youth had been living in a foster home while awaiting sentencing for sexually molesting a 9-year-old girl in Weymouth last year.

The boy is now in the custody of the state Department of Mental Health at Medfield State Hospital, awaiting a hearing Monday in the Hampshire County case.

Simons made the disclosure on Wednesday after he received permission from the court to release information on the youth's admission of the two rapes.

Dissatisfied date loses suit

SPRINGFIELD, Mass. (AP) — A couple who run a dating service have been told they don't have to refund a $250 fee to a dissatisfied customer.

James and Judith Yorio of Easthampton, who have operated Compatibles for three years, were sued for breach of contract earlier this year by a customer, 19-year-old model Thomas Sowers of Springfield.

Sowers claimed that "time and time again" his dates did not have the characteristics he specified.

He admitted most of the dates had nice personalities but "either I wasn't attracted to them, or they weren't attracted to me," he said.

Last summer a Springfield District Court judge ordered the Yorios to give Sowers the $250 he had paid for 14 months of arranged dates.

On Wednesday a Hampden County Superior Court jury agreed with the Yorios, who had appealed the case, arguing they did supply services according to the contract.

'Smoking in the rain'

INTERVALE, N.H. (AP) — Daniel Bianchino thinks he has a pipe smoker's pipedream — a pipe that will stay lit, even in the rain.

To the world, it's an upsidedown pipe that is lit from the bottom.

But to Bianchino, "It's not upside down. It's put right."

The pipe is loaded from the top, which is closed with an airtight cap. But it lights from the bottom through a speciallymade screen, and by burning up instead of down, it stays lit longer, he says.

The stem and intake hole are at the top of the pipe, with the tobacco below so the draw is easy and there are less juices that can burn the tongue, Bianchino claims.

Arrests made in MFA $250,000 gold thefts

By JOHN J. MULLINS
Associated Press

BOSTON — Two men, including a security guard, were arrested yesterday in connection with the theft of at least $250,000 worth of gold and silver objects and coins from the Boston Museum of Fine Arts, the FBI announced.

The announcement came a day after the disappearance of the objects from a temporary storage locker in the museum in what authorities said appeared to be an "inside job."

The FBI announcement identified the arrested men as Richard T. Spear of Rockland, Mass., the museum security guard, and Joseph Cleary of the Dorchester section of Boston.

The FBI said they were arrested by agents and the Boston police on charges of interstate transportation of stolen property in connection with the theft at an arraignment this morning before U.S. Magistrate Joyce Alexander in Boston.

The FBI did not disclose other details or if the objects and coins had been recovered.

Museum officials discovered Wednesday, during a routine check, that an estimated 50 gold objects and some gold coins were missing from a temporary storage locker.

Dr. Jan Fontein, director of the museum and curator of its Asian Department, said the value of the 50 gold objects and coins could not be determined precisely until the inventory was completed and updated appraisals made of the missing objects.

Clementine Brown, spokeswoman for the museum, said there were more than 50,000 items in the Asiatic collection, and all of them had been moved recently because of renovations.

The missing items were described as jewelry, decorative pieces and coins. Many of them are small. Boston Police Detective Sgt. Albert Bornstein said yesterday that earrings and bracelets are among them.

Asked if they would be easy to dispose of as they are, Bornstein said, "If you're in the market for it, it probably is very easy. It depends if you are a collector, I imagine.

"I personally don't think they would melt the stuff down," he said, because it probably would have "nowhere near the value" of the pieces as they were.

But, he said, he did not know the quality of the gold in the missing items, and Ms. Brown said that would be difficult to know because the pieces were from different Asiatic countries and from different periods.

Bornstein said police did not know when the items were stolen. He said there was no sign of a forcible entry., and he said no one had contacted police for a reward.

The museum said the objects were in a steel locker in one of three separately locked storage rooms.

O'Neill predicts swift passage of fuel assistance bill in House

WASHINGTON (AP) — House Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill, calling fuel assistance for the poor a "national priority," predicted swift passage yesterday of an urgent $1.35 billion aid measure.

"This to me is a national emergency," O'Neill told reporters shortly before the House began debate on the hurry-up legislation to help poor people pay their heating bills this winter. "This is a crisis."

O'Neill said he would keep the House in session "until I get that bill through."

While passage seemed assured, a lengthy debate also was a possibility as House members wrangled over details of the costly program.

The $1.35 billion, when combined with $250 million approved earlier by the House, would provide a total of $1.6 billion for low-income households whose heating bills have gone up sharply since last winter.

President Carter has asked Congress to approve the $1.6 billion, and the Senate already has voted its approval in two parts.

Meanwhile, in another energy-related development, the House Rules Committee was meeting to establish ground rules for debate on legislation to establish an Energy Mobilization Board. Two conflicting proposals are pending before the House to set up the board, which would be created to cut red tape hindering completion of important energy projects.

The fundamental issue in the debate is whether the board should have authority to override federal, state and local laws.

Student library suit? No way

By JOSEPH GANNON
Collegian Staff

For students who might wonder what happens to the money they pay for University services such as the library when those services are not fully available, and what avenues might be open for redress of the losses, the story that unfolds in the following paragraphs will help to shed some light on both questions.

In accordance with Article 63 of the State Constitution, all monies collected by the University from students go directly into a state general revenue fund.

After receiving budget requests from the University, Governor, and Board of Higher Education, the Legislature then appropriates a budget to the University.

This policy, according to Michael Pill, a member of the Iowa Bar Association (but not the Massachusetts Bar) and an employee of the Legal Services Office, creates a problem. If students were to file a suit in order to collect some sort of rebate for lost services, they would have to file suit against the state, because all fees go to the state revenue fund, he said.

Pill went on to say this is not possible because of "Sovereign Immunity," which means the state cannot be sued by the students for loss of services at UMass. And that even if students were to force a suit and win, the courts could not make the legislature appropriate the money, he said.

"As it stands now there is nothing to show that a loss of services is illegal," he said. At the University now, there is no tangible agreement between the students and the University guaranteeing continual services.

'A contractual agreement between the University and students would be highly recommended," Pill said. "It would be a better remedy than legal recourse (a suit)," he said.

"A contractual agreement would give students the coverage they need to be able to sue the state," he said.

SGA co-President, Brian Burke, said at this time the SGA was not considering proposing a contractual agreement with the University, but said he liked the idea and would look into it.

Pill also pointed out that the university Board of Trustees, who would have to approve such a contract, now hold complete power over students. "You cannot expect them to be reasonable about giving up that power," he said.

"The real problem that UMass students are faced with and must seek a remedy for, is not how to get a rebate, but a solution to the root of the problem," Pill said, which extends beyond the problem of student redress for rebates.

Rep. Philip W. Johnston, who with Rep. Andrew Card, filed legislation to create the Special Commission Concerning State and County Buildings (Ward Commission), described 'the problem' in his testimony to the Commission: "First, I am convinced that the major source of corruption in government relates to political fund raising."

"One need not be a professional politician to be aware of the fact that most large contributors do not give to candidates out of any idealistic concern for good government," he said.

"They give for a very simple and obvious reason—they expect something in return. Too often the agreement of reciprocity involves contracts."

The Ward Commission is charged by the legislature to "investigate and study corrupt practices and maladministration in certain state and county building contracts and to report its findings to the General Court.

Opinions vary on incidents at liquor store

By BRIAN O'CONNELL
Collegian Staff

Amherst package store owner William Russell yesterday denied charges by three area women that they were attacked by Amherst Policemen at his store last month.

Amherst Police refused to comment on the matter saying "we are not allowed to discuss the case until after the arraignment."

The three women involved, Ada Griffin, a Hampshire College student, Gina Stevens, an Amherst College student, and Sheila Johnson, a librarian at Amherst College, appeared in Hampshire District Court on October 2, and were arraigned yesterday on charges of disorderly conduct.

The women's charges were made in the Oct. 15 issue of Nummo News.

According to a statement released by the Amherst Defense Committee, the women charged they were "attacked and physically brutalized by four Amherst Police officers...while making a purchase at Russell's Liquor store on September 29."

Russell said the police were called in after the women refused to leave the store after the building was closed for business. "Officer Tuttle warned them three times that they would have to leave, or they would have to come down to the station. The women refused to leave," he said.

Russell also said "although the women were physically resisting arrest, and shouting obscenities at the officers and those of us in the store, at no time did any officer strike or harm these women."

Defense Committee member Sonja Chong, reacting to Russell's statements, said that the storeowner "lied, basically on all counts. Although I wasn't at the store that night, I stand by the women's statements."

The statement released by the defense committee said the women were targets of "abusive verbal assaults" while making their purchase. According to the statement, Stevens walked out of the store, "after the purchase was made."

Russell denied these statements saying the police were "as discrete as possible in talking to these women," and "at no time did I or anyone else in the store racially slur these women." Russell added that Stevens

Anti-nukers take protests to Wall Street

By JIM LENNOX
Collegian Staff

Five busloads of people from the UMass area are expected to participate in the attempted New York Stock Exchange takeover Monday Oct. 29. The "Take It to Wall Street" protest is a culmination of weeklong workshops and seminars for area people.

The organizers of the campaign, the Manhattan Project, said they want to close down the New York Stock Exchange for a day to alert people of the real powers behind the nuclear industry.

The action will begin Sunday at noon, with a rally at the World Trade Center. The Manhattan Project called this action an anti-corporate rally and a preliminary to the non-violent civil disobedience action planned for Monday.

"This is an attempt to expose the real roots of the nuclear power industry," according to UMass student Stephen Linsky, "to show people the same old corporations are behind the scene. Just a few of the corporations heavily into the nuclear industry market are Getty Oil, Exxon, Arco, G.E., and Westinghouse," he said.

Linsky also called the action a demand for the exchange to stop trading stocks for nuclear investments.

The Manhattan Project emphasized that the takeover is more than just a nuclear protest. The campaign's goals, according to project literature, are to show the "countless abuses forced upon the American people—disproportionately on working and minority people—by the same institutions and the same system that pushes nuclear power and weapons; to focus on nukes as just one symptom..."

The group also expects to open discussion on the alternative directions from use of nuclear power. Local members said not only has nuclear power proved itself unsafe but it robs a tremendous amount of capital from other areas.

The takeover of the exchange has been well publicized by the group and police are expected to set barricades. Entrance to the floor of the exchange is limited to members and employees, according to Linsky, but protestors will try to block the many entrances and in general impede the normal order.

Still more male professors than women

Editor's Note: This is the last in a three-part series on working women at UMass.

By DONNA SULLIVAN
Collegian Staff

Female professors are a small minority at UMass. In the past, most have faced some form of discrimination and have had to deal with problems unique to women. Nevertheless their situation at the University is lacking with optimism.

According to a UMass Factsheet—A Monthly Collection of Facts and Figures, women number just 6.4 percent of full professors. As the teaching rank decreases, the percentage of women increases. Almost half of the lecturers—the lowest teaching rank, are women.

According to English Professor Kathleen Swaim, there is no room for change. The English department has not been hiring, so there is no chance to redress the balance. "I would like to see more women in the department but I cannot see how that could be when we are not hiring," she said.

A significant effort was made to hire women in the early 1970's, Swaim said, but many have left or have been let go. Those who left voluntarily did not feel as if they were supported; they were not given graduate courses and they were not given equipment they asked for.

"That is not so much true in the present though, now there is no money to give anybody," Swaim said. "My view of the English department now is on the positive side. I can see the changes; they proceeded at a fair pace. Women are allowed to be full department citizens now," she said.

"Affirmative Action in the 1970's has made a strong difference in the way male scholars regard their colleagues and students," art historian Ann Mochon said. "The issue has been brought to the forefront. Efforts to hire women are being enforced."

Prior to 1977, women of equal rank were paid considerably less than their male counterparts. According to Swaim, the provost set up committees for the distribution of equity adjustments—equalizing pay and giving women pay increases.

Women still earn less, but the gap is decreasing. Female full professors are currently earning $27,652 while the males earn $30,129, according to the UMass Factsheet.

Female professors with children play dual roles—mother and educator. Traditionally restricted to the role of mother, these career women sometimes face obstacles but generally cope with both sets of responsibilities.

"I never found it terribly burdensome," Iris Cheney of the art history department said. "I had a full-day babysitter but I was not away that much while they were little."

Professor Cheney, mother of two children now grown, feels that living in a rural area means you do not have to worry as much about the kids. "They play in the neighborhood and you do not have to worry about picking them up from school," she said.

Professor Marion Rhodes of the chemistry department was in a different situation. A widow with a son, she had no choice but to work. "If I had not had my family to fall back on, it would have been very difficult," she said. "Women were not considered as wage earners. So many things have changed. Now child care is deductible."

Most of the biggest obstacles were in the past. "I can remember not getting past a receptionist for a chemist's job because they did not want women and it would have meant her job to let me by. There was nothing we could do about it. We learned to cope and learned when it was worth fighting," Rhodes said.

"I did not encounter any overt problems," Mochon said, "There were subtle means of suggesting areas to work in. Our culture has not encouraged women to think in terms of long-term career goals," she said.

One professor who prefers to remain anonymous said, "I applied to Yale graduate school in 1948 and was told they did not accept women." She said she worked for a company that as a rule paid women less.

"A question I hear less and less is 'How come you never got married?' A single woman pursuing a career is no longer unusual," she said.

Black Affairs

Rally tomorrow to support Russell's incident

On Sept. 29 three black women were assaulted physically and verbally at Russell's Liquor Store in downtown Amherst. Violent acts against the Third World Community are not new to this area. Earl Brown, Craeman Gethers, Seta Rampersad, Jill Dickinson and Jose Pontes are all victims of Third World violence. However, the fact that these things are beginning to occur more frequently becomes very frightening. It seems a semester does not pass without a Third World person suffering some type of abuse and injustice.

These acts are treated without full prosecution by the law. Craeman Gethers and Earl Brown were framed for the McDonald's robbery in 1977. Brown has been freed while Gethers is still in jail. The case of Seta Rampersad was closed although the events surrounding her death were never fully sorted and the cause of her death never clearly defined. Jill Dickinson was found in the bushes outside of the Franklin Dining Commons, in Spring 1978, when a passerby heard her moaning. Today she suffers from loss of memory and partial paralysis in one arm. Her case is yet to be solved. Jose Pontes was found dead in his dormitory room last year, and although there were several indications that he did not take his own life, his death was labeled as suicide.

The Russell's Liquor Store incident brings about a new turn to Third World violence. In the past, we have not been able to look toward law officials for complete protection, but at least many of us did not think that we would be (felt that we could not be) physically attacked by them. One of the women, Ada Griffin, was pushed against a wine rack and then thrown to the floor where she was handcuffed and physically sat upon by a police officer. Ada weighs only 95 pounds and it seems incredible that such a petite woman would need to be restrained in such a vicious matter.

On Wednesday, Oct. 24, the three women, Ada Griffin, Sheila Johnson and Gina Stevens were arraigned in Northampton on charges of disorderly behavior. Fifty people were present to support the sisters. It is exactly this type of physical support that the Third World community needs to show. Whatever happens to any Third World person in this area, directly affects each and everyone of us. As long as these things continue at a growing rate, all of our lives and well-being are in constant danger.

This Saturday there is a rally at the Amherst Town Commons at 2 p.m. The rally is in support of the sisters involved in the Russell's incident, but the rally really stands for the fight against oppression by the Third World Community. In the past, rallies of this sort have not received the support that they should have. It is in the interest of the entire community to be present.

Women arraigned in Wednesday's hearing

By VUKANI MUGABANE

Three black women were arraigned Wednesday before a crowded Northampton District courtroom on disorderly conduct charges stemming from an incident at Russell's liquor store in Amherst September 29.

There were no findings in the case which is scheduled to go on trial before a Northampton judge November 21. Pre-trial motions by the defense to see police reports and particulars on the case were granted by the court.

The three women are Sheila Johnson, a librarian at Amherst College, Ada Griffin and Gina Stevens, students at Hampshire College. According to reports, the women were verbally assaulted by a store clerk and physically assaulted by the Amherst Police.

Members of the Third World community have scheduled a rally Saturday at the Amherst Town Commons beginning at 2 p.m. Tony Crayton, director of Third World Affairs, Lloyd Hogan, Professor of Economic's Hampshire College, Chaka Zulu, a UMass graduate, and Lisa Gaugharan, member of the political prisoner's support committee are scheduled to speak.

Steering committee meeting held last night

By JAMES LEWIS and TERRELL EVANS
Black Affairs Staff

The New Africa House Steering Committee held its first formal meeting of the 1979-80 academic year to address campus issues and to introduce new constitutional ideas. The meeting was called by Tony Crayton, Director of the Office of Third World Affairs who drafted the proposed constitution.

The proposal also designated the Steering Committee as the Third World Steering Committee. These issues will be discussed further next week.

After limited discussion of the proposed constitution, various campus issues were raised concerning Black History month which is in February of 1980, WMUA and BMCP programming problems, racial attacks against Third World women on and off the UMass campus, problems between the Collegian and Nummo News and the situation with the Asian American Students office in the New Africa House.

Mark Hickson, former chairman of the steering committee gave a brief history of the origins of the committee and its inception in 1970 with the takeover of Mills House, which is now the New Africa House. He explained that the Steering Committee was the result of students controlling the actions of the Third World organizations on campus.

Mr. Crayton gave a brief explanation for calling the meeting, stating the inadequacy of the Steering Committee to meet consistently.

The proposed constitution would create a Board of Directors of 8 to 10 persons empowered to handle the day-to-day problems that arise within the Third World organizations on campus. The Board would be elected from the Steering Committee, which has about thirty members consisting of one delegate from each Third World organization on campus.

Discussion of Black History month included the creation of a planning committee to arrange a series of programs and activities to take place.

Rick Scott Gordon, known as Ujaama and Ed Cohen were suspended for two weeks for committing what Gary Lee, the Black Mass Communication's Project News director described as "minor" infractions. Tony Johnson, Chairman of Governmental Affairs of the Student Senate, expressed deep concern over the possible absence of Reverend William Pearson's Sunday morning gospel program.

There were complaints by Third World women of racial verbal abuse by persons yelling from Wheeler Dormitory. Nummo News expressed a concern about the working agreement with the Collegian concerning working hours in the Student Senate Offices.

Mike Suzuki, co-chairman of the Asian American Students Association (AASA) wrote a letter to the steering committee stating a complaint about the removal of AASA office equipment from their office in New Africa House.

Their representative at the meeting complained that they were not notified of the move and their office space being reappropriated to another organization. The next meeting will be held next Thursday at 4:30 pm in the Augusta Salvage Memorial Museum in New Africa House.

Carter, Kennedy expected to battle over Black vote

By MICHAEL J. SNIFFEN
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Strategists in the Carter presidential campaign are ready to mount an attack on Sen. Edward M. Kennedy's record for hiring minority workers.

Sources close to the Carter campaign believe the president's record is so superior to Kennedy's that this issue could decide which man gets the traditional black vote that both camps consider crucial to winning the 1980 Democratic presidential nomination.

But while there are opportunities, there are also pitfalls for the Carter camp in such a strategy, since blacks are hard to find among Carter's closest advisers.

Further, Kennedy's aides dispute the case.

"You'd think that they could come up with better points to make," says Kennedy spokesman Tom Southwick. "I don't think anyone has a stronger civil rights record over the past 17 years than Kennedy."

But one black Democrat, a state party official allied with Carter, argues that hiring records "will be a big issue in the black community."

In his view, Carter and Kennedy are so close on issues of concern to blacks that black Democrats might decide between the two on the basis of hiring records.

"Carter has a record on black appointments in top administration jobs that goes beyond rhetoric," says the Carter partisan, who declined to be identified. "Kennedy starts strong with blacks because of his family and the 1960s, but once the campaign begins, he's going to have to justify his horrible record on this over 17 years in the Senate."

Another source, familiar with the thinking of Carter campaign strategists, said, "Kennedy has spoken all the right words, but he's never had a black in a position of any policy responsibility or among his brain trust of informal advisers."

Southwick, Kennedy's spokesman, demurs.

Of informal advisers, he said: "The senator is very close to Vernon Jordan of the Urban League. And right now, he's meeting with Mrs. Coretta Scott King and 'Daddy' King on legislation the senator is sponsoring that concerns them: the District of Columbia voting rights amendment."

Black guerilla base attacked

SAN SALVADOR, El Salvador [AP] — El Salvador's new military-civilian junta expressed willingness Thursday to negotiate with leftists holding 130 hostages in the labor and economy ministries, but there was no immediate response.

Labor Minister Gabriel Gallegos Valdes and Economy Minister Manuel Hinds are among the hostages.

Informed sources, who asked not to be identified, said members of the junta were making private calls to leaders of leftwing groups to try to reach a settlement.

A government statement said only, "The junta is willing to negotiate a peaceful solution."

Che-Lumumba presents art show

We dance, we sing
we paint unicorns in the sky and write poems in the sea, we have visions of future
full of creativity.

CREATIVITY is the essence of an exciting exhibition of art works by the children of the Che Lumumba School. Displayed at the Student Union Gallery, University of Massachusetts, from October 22 to November 2, this show is a glimpse of the school's collective future.

The Che Lumumba School was begun in 1972 as an alternative educational institution for children of Third World families in the Amherst community. The educational program of Che-Lumumba is geared toward the development of children who are able to think critically, analytically, and creatively in seeking alternative solutions to the problems faced in the world around us.

This show is part of a continuing semester-long project of discovery, featuring the contributions of the Aztec and Inca peoples of Central America. Featured works include collages, drawings, and masks depicting the rich cultural heritage of these ancient nations.

The play "Myth of Quetzalcotl", with costumes designed and direction supervised by the students themselves, will also be presented free of charge in the Gallery, Tuesday, October 30 and Thursday, November 1 at 7 p.m. An informational slide show about the Che Lumumba School will also be continuously shown in the gallery.

★ Drop outs

discover their problems and monitor them."

Shaw said that in the Rhetoric program there is a captive audience of freshmen. This provides an opportunity for general counseling by the Faculty. Assignments can also be geared to help the student sort out goals, he said.

"An upgrading of the January admissions orientation program might increase the retention rate," said Shaw.

"It is possible that there is a high drop-out rate in this group of students for two reasons: the orientation period is not as good as the summer orientation and also, these students are those who were deterred fall admissions—they are not very strong to begin with."

Shaw said those who eventually drop out meet with their advisors less often than those who stay. In fact, it is often the motivated, strong student who sees an advisor rather than the student who needs the most advising.

"Maybe there is something missing in the supporting services," said Shaw, referring to financial aid, social work services and academic advising. Unlike foreign students, black students and women, for example, the white male does not have a social support group.

Shaw said not all the reasons why students leave are negative. However, the most common are financial needs, difficulties with studies, personal problems and health problems. He added that a large number of students do not indiciate their reasons for leaving.

Sarah Hamilton, director of the New Students Program, said the goal of the Summer Counseling Program is to retain the students for the first two weeks of the fall semester.

Aside from the general purpose to assist students in selecting courses and living areas, Hamilton said the intention is to present the University positively as an environment that can be successfully dealt with, encouraging self-motivation and assertive behaviors.

Last summer, Hamilton added, we sponsored two evening workshops—one on developing successful study skills and one on personal relationships. Of 400 students, 100 used these, the majority favoring the study skill workshop, she said.

"We also added a slide show on vandalism to create in the students a sense of concern and a respect for the University. Strict disciplinary action was taken with troublemakers to make it clear to them that just because UMass is big does not mean it tolerates bad behavior. This also creates a small college community feeling," said Hamilton.

Keeping students in a university is an issue of growing concern among many colleges, said Kedesdy.

SCERA staffer supports causes

By ADAM GROSSMAN
Collegian Staff

The first impression you get from Ken Mosakowski is that he's in a hurry. You speak quickly to him because you are sure he has ten other things to do. Mosakowski is the legislative research director of the Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy (SCERA).

Currently, Mosakowski is involved with proposition 2-1/2, a property tax cut proposal which could cut back state funds to UMass. He is also involved with the drafting of legislation for student empowerment, such as the UMass Building Authority Bill, which would put two students on the Board of Trustees of the UMass Building Authority.

"Students are an oppressed minority," said Mosakowski, sitting on the steps of the School of Business Administration. He had just attended a faculty meeting in hope of distributing petitions against proposition 2-1/2, he said.

Mosakowski's main goal at SCERA is the freeing of students from the ranks of the "oppressed minority." He said he has always been a political activist and since attending school here, an activist for students' issues. He graduated in 1969 with a B.A. degree and honors in English Literature.

His current projects include an anti-draft legislation bill and a better grievance system for students. He is also the producer and moderator of "Focus," a public affairs series broadcast by WMUA, UMass radio.

"Developing a respectable image for students is very important," he said, shuffling some papers. "Most demonstrations at the state house just don't have any effect." He said he feels students must prove themselves before they'll have any clout in government.

Ken Mosakowski continually looks to the future. A pet project of his now is amassing the voting power of 100,000 state college students for the 1980 elections.

UMass sponsors East Coast karate tournament

By KARIN HOLMES
Collegian Staff

An East Coast Collegiate Karate Union tournament will be held at 1:30 p.m. Saturday in Curry Hicks Cage, featuring a demonstration in Chanoyu or Tea Ceremony by Hisashi Yamada, director of the New York branch of the Tea Ceremony of Urasenke.

Teams from Cornell, Drexel, and Temple Universities, Jefferson Medical College, UMass, St. Joseph's College and Westchester State College are expected to compete at the tournament in both sparring and kata events. A $1.50 donation is requested at the event.

Gerald Evens, fourth degree black belt and three-time national sparring champion, will also give a karate demonstration with Ronald Johnson, fourth degree black belt.

Professor Sally Grimes, of the Journalism Department and the head of the Karate Club, said the tea-ceremony demonstration is "one of the traditional Zen-related Japanese Arts in which the host sends tea to a guest. Tea and karate have a lot in common philosophically."

Richard Jordan scores with a sidekick on Mark Devino. Both UMass students will participate in the East Coast Karate Union Tournament Saturday at 1:30 p.m. in the Curry Hicks Cage. Tickets will be available at the door. (Staff photo by Doug Paulding)

Incidents in Southwest

Jack Gallagher

Last weekend, two people got into a fight in Southwest—which is nothing new.

That the incident drew a crowd is nothing new, either—though the spectacle was a bit perverse.

One of the participants, apparently, told the other participant that he would hit him over the head with a baseball bat. But he wasn't, unfortunately, referring to a Ramones' song, though he should have been.

So the instigator, the guy who threatened to use a baseball bat, was pretty tough; he wanted those present to know that, too.

Then the police came, and thus the would-be scene of bloody violence—which in fact the instigator wanted about as much as the would-be victim—never happened.

But action ensued, in which a host of witnesses—self-proclaimed—made statements to the police, telling them what did and did not happen. Meantime, most of the onlookers had left, in the hope of finding more suitable entertainment.

This incident was unrelated, is what the police would say; a separate act of wanton would-be violence. (It was unrelated in that it wasn't unrelated to anything, anywhere.)

But it wasn't even close to Halloween, and it happened, nonetheless.

Oh yes, Halloween. A time when half the student population is drunk, four sheets to the wind; while the other half seeks subterranean shelter because of some little pill.

But back to the incident: No one cared, except those who got their cars towed because they stood outside watching nothing for over an hour.

Southwest was a lot more exciting when I lived there.

But now drinkers have to go underground, whether good. And the police, most of whom couldn't pass for rent-a-cops anywhere else, are going to have the time of their lives this weekend.

Tant pis.

But sources say Southwest isn't the only place on this campus.

Other residential colleges do exist—with problems of their own. Someone said there is a litter problem in Northeast, but I find that source hard to believe.

Everyone knows that everywhere but Southwest is college, the latter being projects built, conjointly, by a social psychology research institute and Chase Manhattan Bank.

Last weekend, too, in Southwest, there was a party, into which everyone snuck. The legal capacity of the building was about 150 people, but there were about 300 people there; but last year I took a course called "BA 210" and the sign on the hall said the seating capacity was 350, but about 425 were enrolled in the course.

Don't blame me, though, because this newspaper's Board of Directors always say that they want controversy, until something really controversial decides to happen, of course.

Craziness need not be hollow

UMass students will transform this campus into a bizarre fantasy land this weekend and on into next—but the proven reality is an increase in violence against both persons and property.

It might not be a question of razor blades in apples but the anything-goes atmosphere poses a threat to all persons, especially women, as they walk through campus.

The weekend's activities draw strangers to the Valley, increasing the chance for totally wasteful vandalism and violence. During Halloween weekend last year, the majority of persons taken into custody by the police were not UMass students. The majority of them were guests of UMass students, however.

As adults, we are responsible not only for our own actions, but for the actions of our guests.

According to UMass Police Chief Robert Joyce, last Halloween marked the worst record of vandalism and harrassment in UMass history. He was surprised no lives were lost.

If all this seems trite, keep in mind who pays for the damage. Us.

None of us can afford the cost, be it monetary or the University's reputation.

'United drive' Ted's ticket?

By JIM MORAN
Collegian Staff

Efforts are growing in Massachusetts to create a united drive for the presidential candidacy of Sen. Edward M. Kennedy for the Democratic nomination.

A spokesperson for the draft Kennedy campaign in New Hampshire said the Senator has been contacting members of the Massachusetts' Democratic congressional delegation in an attempt to line up support for the senator's candidacy before his official announcement.

It was learned Wednesday that U.S. Rep. Joseph D. Early, D-Worcester, has been in touch with Kennedy on his possible candidacy. Paul Nordberg, press secretary for the congressman, said Wednesday "It is the overwhelming likelihood that Sen. Kennedy will run." Nordberg said the Senator has been in touch with Early "a good amount of time in the last ten days" and that "The congressman is convinced the Senator will run."

Kennedy was the principal speaker at a $100-a-plate fundraiser for Early at the Pleasant Valley Country Club in Worcester Wednesday evening.

The office of U.S. Rep. Robert F. Drinan, D-Newton, said Wednesday that Drinan has received no contact from Kennedy on a Presidential candidacy, but reports that the senator is planning to speak at a Washington fundraiser for the congressman on November 5.

Drinan press secretary Michael Shea said, "The congressman hasn't come out either way, but as of now he's supporting President Carter for the Democratic nomination for president." Shea added, "Ideologically, the congressman is closer to Kennedy than Carter, and would probably endorse him if he were to announce."

But Shea also said that Drinan does not feel the president has received the recognition on "some of the good thing s he's done" in the areas of human rights and foreign policy.

U.S. Rep. Edward P. Boland, D-Springfield, who represents Massachusetts Second Congressional District, has been in contact with Sen. Kennedy "on a number of occasions" according to press spokesman Michael Sheehy. "But I wouldn't have the knowledge as to the nature of their discussions," Sheehy said Wednesday. "I assume political developments were discussed when the congressman spoke with Kennedy at the JFK Library dedication," Sheehy concluded.

David Hoffman, a press aide to Rep. Edward J. Markey, D-Malden, said Wednesday that Markey and Kennedy have talked in their capacities as co-sponsors of a nuclear moratorium bill. Hoffman stated, "I would say the question is whether Congressman Markey has talked politics to Senator Kennedy in terms of the Senator's providing a leadership alternative to President Carter on several issues of national prominence." The answer to that, said Hoffman, "is yes."

Markey serves as Co-Chairman of New England Congressional delegation's Energy Task Force, and has proposed a halt to the construction of new nuclear power plants nationwide. Sen. Kennedy filed a joint measure in the Senate last July. Hoffman added, "In the process, they've talked about the Democratic primaries and caucuses."

U.S. House Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill Jr. "has talked with Sen. Kennedy last at the dedication of the JFK Library," according to press secretary Gary Hymel. Hymel would not comment further on the nature of their discussions.

The Massachusetts Committee for A Democratic Alternative in 1980, the draft-Kennedy group in the Bay State, is "closing up shop on Tuesday." This word comes from Greg Jarboe, a staffer for State Sen. Sharon D. Pollard, D-Methuen, who heads the Committee. Jarboe said the effort is being dismantled "in anticipation of an official Kennedy candidacy." He said this was being done in lieu of the formation of an "exploratory" committee on behalf of the Senator's presidential candidacy this Tuesday. According to Federal Election Commission rules, Kennedy has 30 days to accept or refuse such an official effort.

"It is likely he will announce, barring any unforseen developments, by mid-November," said Jarboe. He attributed this to the fact that Kennedy has scheduled "several" trips to the West coast around that time, and that "it would be a good opportunity for him to announce before those appearances so he could campaign then."

Jarboe said the Massachusetts draft-Kennedy committee will supply Sen. Kennedy's Boston office with their "organizational plans and contacts" on Tuesday, with the hopes that "the Senator will take advantage of the thousands of people committed to work for his White House bid."

'Edge of Night' actors at Smith

Six longtime cast members of ABC-TV's soap opera, "Edge of Night" will stage a demonstration today from 2:10-4:10 at Smith College in Sage Hall, room 2. The demonstration will include the staging of actual "Edge of Night" scenes and videotape showing of these scenes actually broadcast.

The actors will also work with student soap scripts and student actors on the difference of stage and television acting. The demonstration is free. For further information, call: Prof. Len Berkman, 584-2700, ext. 423.

Radio broadcasts special musical programs

WFCR-FM radio has four special broadcasts scheduled for this weekend.

Tonight at 8, WFCR will broadcast live from Amherst College, three Beethoven concerts by violinist Philipp Naegele and pianist Luis Batlle.

On Saturday at 2 p.m., the station will broadcast the San Franciso Opera Company live from the San Francisco War Memorial House. This is a series which will be heard on the station every Saturday. Tomorrow's show will be Claude Debussy's "Pelleas and Melisande."

Also, on Saturday at 7 p.m., and on Oct. 30 at 8 p.m. and Nov. 6 at 8 p.m., the opening night performances of the Vienna State Opera in its American debut at the Kennedy Center in Washington, D.C. will be broadcast live. The concert will be broadcast exclusively by National Public Radio Stations.

And on Sunday at 8 p.m., the first of a series of six one-hour episodes of the Masterpiece Radio Theatre dramatizing D.H. Lawrence's, Sons and Lovers will be broadcast.

BOSTON — After months of delay, the Massachusetts House and Senate are moving to the bargaining table to decide the final terms of a state construction budget.

The capital outlay budget concerns several UMass projects, including an amendment by the senate which would allow the university to use extra funds to correct noise and ventilation problems at the Graduate Research Towers.

The Senate also approved a $3 million amendment for ongoing repairs and renovations to various campus buildings, including roofing, elevators, and mechanical and electrical improvements.

The senate amendment followed a rejection of the proposal in the House, and will now be referred to a conference committee. Serving on the committee are Senators John Olver, D-Amherst, Chester Atkins, D-Concord, and John Alyme, R-Cape Plymouth. Representatives include John Finnegan, D-Boston, Dennis Duffin, D-Lenox, and Lincoln P. Cole, R-Lexington.

Both actions taken by the senate yesterday are part of the overall state capital outlay bill and await governor approval before the university can use the proposed appropriations.

N.E. Women Center to receive cuts

By ANDREA ATKINS
Collegian Staff

Assuming the allowance of the Undergraduate Student Senate's seven percent budget cut the area governments, Northeast Area Government and the Southwest Assembly this week passed the reduction on to special programs in the respective areas.

NEAG president Chris Decker told representatives from the area's Women Center that the government could not meet their proposed budget of $1,333. Decker said he would "like to meet the budget half-way. I am in favor of the Women's Center," he said, "It's a good idea, a valuable one for the area.' The center was later given a $400 budget cut by NEAG, when it passed a $933 budget.

According to Co-president Bruce Levy of the SWA, the representatives voted to pass the cut to the budget committee which allocates money to centers. "Major opposition (to the cuts) came from members of the Malcolm X Center," Levy said. "That was the only opposition."

In a meeting lasting over two hours, representatives of NEAG discussed alternatives to budgeting for the center which has been closed for the past year, due to staff turnover.

Carol Wallace, a former staff adviser to the center, explained the functions of the Northeast Women's Center. According to Wallace, in the 1976 and 1977 academic years, the center had budgets that ranged from $1,000 to $1,500 per year. With this money, Wallace said, the center "offered workshops to the quad, sponsored coffee houses, special events, movies, speakers, and colloquia that were always well-attended."

The center also had staff available for peer counseling, Wallace said. "For that sum of money we presented a whole range of things that appealed to a whole range of people," she said.

The budget submitted by the Women's Center included allocations for books, magazine subscriptions, office supplies, coffee houses, and a typewriter which, according to one of the center's representatives, was stolen from the center during the past year.

The Women's Center also asked for $625 to fund a "Spring Fling—A Celebration of the Women of the Quad." Mindy Kingston, one of the centers coordinators, said this day would "start a tradition" in Northeast.

Proposals to combine Spring Fling with Northeast's annual Quad day were rejected by the men and women supporting the Center's budget.

Woman rabbi to mime

By JOYCE C. MUNROE
Collegian Staff

"Portraits of Biblical Women" will be the theme of a free performance in storytelling and mime by Rabbi Lynn Gotlieb this Sunday at 8 p.m. in the Campus Center.

The performance will be "one of the major events of Jewish Women's Week" according to Marian Hait of the B'nai B'rith Hillel Foundation at UMass.

The woman rabbi, presently affiliated with the Congregation for the Deaf in New York City and founder of the Bat Kol Players mime troup, will sign and mime her message.

According to Judy Caplan, a member of the Jewish Women's Week organizing committee, one of the rabbi's Biblical themes will be "women of the desert."

"She will recapture some of the energy of women who were involved in the Exodus," she said, "to show the important role those women played." It is a way to combine culture and religion, she added.

Got something on your mind? Why not let 25,000 other people know by writing a letter to the Collegian?

IM cross-country results

By DONNA SULLIVAN
Collegian Staff

Jim Dillon was the first to cross the line in the intramural cross country meet held Wednesday. Running in the graduate-faculty class, Dillon completed the 1.8 mile run around Stadium Road in eight minutes and ten seconds.

Ed Sandifer and Rick Cleary, finishing second and third respectively, combined with Gove Effinger and Rick Breen to take the grad-fac team win for the Math and Statistics department.

Andy Vibert was the first female to finish, with a time of ten minutes and 41 seconds. Vibert ran for the Pumas. Finishing second was Jennifer Black, an independent, and third was Ann MacDonald also a Puma.

According to Fian Nooijen of the intramural department, a team had to consist of at least four members and none of the women's teams had more than three runners, thus, no women's team winner.

In men's undergrad action, Bill Tharion finished first followed by twins Andy and Jerry Epstein finishing second and third. Tharion was an independent, the Epsteins were members of the Tital Striders, the only Striders to enter the race.

Pike was the men's undergrad team winner with six entrants—Jack Morin, Shawn Kimball, Charlie Barry, Rick Handschuch, Mike Barricelli and Brad Eveland.

"We had a good turnout," Nooijen said. "We even had about 10 to 15 people running just for the fun of running."

Kickers transcend into UConn

By DAVE BRADLEY
Collegian Staff

The men's soccer team, coming off a memorable performance in its 1-0 loss to the University of Rhode Island last week, will try to bust out of the scoring doldrums and win some notoriety tomorrow when it plays the University of Connecticut in Storrs. Game time is 10:00 a.m.

The Minutemen will be facing a team similar to the one they played last week in a couple respects. When the Rams came to town they were the number one team in New England, ranked tenth in the nation. One week later UConn has taken over both these positions.

Are the Huskies really as good as their 14-4 record indicates?

"They are awesome," said UMass coach Russ Kidd yesterday after seeing them play Tuesday. "They have tremendous depth, skill, speed...some real stick wingers. They looked at the peak of their game."

UConn's game, statistics indicate, includes a high-scoring offense and an almost impenetrable defense. In 18 games the Huskies have scored 61 goals, allowed 16, and have recorded 8 shutouts. They have won their last five games by shutouts while scoring 22 goals.

The four Huskie losses were each by one point to respectable teams. They lost to Clemson University (ranked sixth nationally) in overtime, 2-1, St. Louis University (ranked tenth), 2-1, San Francisco University (ranked fourth), 4-3, and the University of Vermont, 2-1.

Kidd said that as result of UConn playing in this kind of "big company," Huskies coach Joe Morrone has developed a rotation system in which players are substituted at

Spikers home

By MAUREEN SULLIVAN
Collegian Staff

They have finally come home.

After six weeks on the road, the women's volleyball team will host Barrington College and Southern Connecticut State College at NOPE Saturday afternoon, beginning at 1:00 PM.

The Minutewomen are in a "must win" situation; they must do well against these two teams in order to bolster their chances of being invited to the Regionals next month. However, UMass meets one of the finest teams in New England Saturday, Southern Conn. A perennial entry in Regional action, SC has defeated other top schools like Springfield College and Central Conn. in recent weeks.

Last year, UMass faced Southern Conn. in the URI Tournament; the Minutewomen lost 9-15, 13-15.

UMass' record stands at 13-5, as of Thursday.

Women booters

By ROB EMMONS
Collegian Staff

The first women's varsity soccer defeat in UMass history (which occurred earlier this month at UVM) is fast becoming a distant memory as the Minutewomen kickers roll on, flattening foes far and wide. Thursday's victim was Dartmouth. The Big Green found themselves blanked at home 2-0.

A talented Dartmouth defense withheld the UMass onslaught for a respectable period; the first goal didn't come until Nina Holmstrom capitalized on a penalty kick at 14:55 of the second half. Angie Caouette finished the day's scoring when she cashed in on a miscue by the host's goalie with less than ten minutes to play.

Showing a strong team effort, the Minutewomen controlled play throughout the game and outshot Dartmouth 31-10.

By JAY BRIGHTMAN
Collegian Staff

The men's JV soccer team battled to a double overtime 1-1 draw against UMass/Boston's varsity squad in front of Boyden yesterday afternoon.

"It was a day when the ball didn't want to go in," said Niemiec.

The Minutemen outshot the Boston squad 18-4.

The lone Minutemen goal came 19 minutes into the game when UMass winger Kevin Fowler booted a direct kick (an offensive kick from 25 yards in front of defending net) into the upper left corner.

Five minutes into the second half Boston scored when three players moved in unmolested on goalie Brett Oshler to bring the game to a draw.

The game took a bad turn for UMass/Amherst when winger Joe Bortolotti was tripped and retaliated by using a racial epithat. This caused him to be ejected from the game and left UMass playing one man short for the remainder of the contest.

"We deserved a victory. We had one defensive lapse which they capitalized on, yet we had many scoring opportunities," said Niemiec. "I was especially happy with the play of Gary Deets and Mike Jenkins when our team was one man short."

virtually every whistle, which "keeps them fresh."

"Our problem is we have to adjust to this," Kidd said. "We've got to match their depth somehow."

UConn defeated UMass 2-1 last year, but Kidd noted that "for the first 35 minutes (of the game) we were tenacious as hell...and to beat a UConn, that's what you've got to do."

Kidd said his team does not dwell on the slim prospects of making the NCAA playoffs, but hopes are not altogether dead.

"This is really our last chance to do something of note," the coach said. "If we can beat these guys and win the rest of our games, we have a shot."

Gridders plan nightmare for Connecticut

By MARK MARCHAND
Collegian Staff

Now ranked third in the country in Division 1-AA, the UMass football team will travel to Storrs, Conn. today to prepare for tomorrow afternoon's Yankee Conference showdown with the 1-4-1 Huskies of UConn.

A UMass win in tomorrow's contest will secure at least a tie for the Minutemen in the Yankee Conference and give the UMass gridders their 14th consecutive win within the conference.

"We're not looking past UConn," said UMass coach Bob Pickett. "We want to win the Yankee Conference first, then we'll think about the rest of the schedule. I said before the season that UConn would be tough, I still feel that way now."

Riding the crest of a five-game winning streak, the Minutemen will be facing a tough UConn squad whose 1-4-1 ledger is a deceptive look at its season thus far. The Huskies opened their season with three tough games against Army, Navy, and Yale, losing all three before tying New Hampshire in a 3-3 contest. From there, the Huskies played a solid game against Division One powerhouse Rutgers before succumbing to a Scarlet Knight drive in the fourth quarter and losing by a 24-16 score. Last week, the Huskies downed Yankee Conference doormat Maine 19-7 for the only UConn win.

If the Huskies have a weakness at this time it's at the quarterback position where sophomore signal caller Alan Arison has taken over for Ken Sweitzer, a sophomore who quarterbacked UConn during his freshman year last season. Sweitzer has since moved to a wide receiver position because of an injury sustained early this season. A sophomore, Arison has completed 24 of 56 passes for 194 yards thus far along with two touchdowns and five interceptions. His favorote targets are split end L. Reginald Eccleston and tight end Kenneth Miller; both have combined for four TD receptions from Arison.

Catch all the action of Minutemen football on WMUA, 91.1 FM, this Saturday when UMass travels to the University of Connecticut. Howie Sobolov and Tim Wasserman describe the action. The pregame show with Jim Mullins begins at 1:00.

In the running department, UConn puts the bulk of the rushing attack on the shoulders of halfback Anthony Gordon who has carried the ball 133 times this season for 491 yards.

Defensively, the Huskies have allowed almost 18 points per game to the primarily Division One schedule they've played thus far. Forming the backbone for the defense are linebacker Jeff Thomas and cornerbacks Peter Lamagna, Ted Walton, and Jody Webb.

On the Minuteman side of things, UMass learned that quarterback Mike McEvilly was named to the weekly Yankee Conference All-Star list for his offensive efforts in last Saturday's blanking of the Rhode Island Rams. The Clinton native is now close to bettering all of his stats from last year's banner season.

"That guy McEvilly is worth the price of the ticket to get in," said UConn head coach Walt Nadzak.

Last year, UMass downed UConn 17-10 in a game that featured seven UConn turnovers. Overall, the series between the two schools stands at 27-20-2 with the Minutemen holding the upper hand. A traditional rivalry year after year, tomorrow's game is homecoming day on the Storrs campus.

"This game is such a great rivalry," related Nadzak. "It's really healthy for college ball; things just seem to happen in these games."

After Saturday's game, UMass will return home to face the Crusaders of Holy Cross in a 1:00 p.m. contest next Saturday. From there, the Minutemen will face the New Hampshire Wildcats the following Saturday.

Halfway through the madness

The 1979 NFL season is half over, and if the second eight weeks are as exciting and unpredictable as the first eight, this will prove to be one of the most exciting seasons in the last couple of decades.

The first two months of the year have produced a multitude of close games, upsets exciting plays and lots and lots of offense. As it looks right now, there are only five teams in the league that do not have a realistic shot at making the playoffs.

The new rules instituted at the beginning of the season to cut down on injuries and make the games more exciting have done just that. The quarterback attrition rate is about half of what it was last year, and with no bumps outside of five yards of the line of scrimmage the long pass has returned to prominance for the first time since Darryl Lamonica's "Mad Bomber" days with the Raiders.

So far, there are no real surprises with regard to who is leading the divisions and who is dwelling in the cellar. A few teams have done better than expected, Tampa Bay, Washington, Kansas City and Cleveland. And a few teams have not done as well as expected, Los Angeles, Cincinnati, Detroit and Miami.

The big surprise, to me anyway, is that this pathetic prognastigator is batting .1000 so far. In September, he picked New England, Pittsburgh, San Diego, Dallas, Tampa Bay and L.A. to win their respective divisions, and miracle of miracles those are the teams on top at this junction.

Whether things will stay this way or not only time will tell, but I for one am not looking for any drastic changes in the divisional races.

New England has put together a defense that is No. 1 in just about everything, and Steve Grogan has finally put two good games together in a row. If (and this is an Andre the Giant size if) the Pats can stay healthy, they just might make it to Pasadina.

In Miami, the mid-season blues have people wondering about those Dolphins. Bob Griesce in 79 is playing like Ken Stabler did in 78. It might be time to give Don Strock a chance to see what he can do.

The Jets have turned into an opportunistic bunch lately, and have put together two wins in a row and a 4-4 receed. The Jets still have far too many defensive deficiencies to make a serious run at the playoffs.

The Steelers absolutely annihilated the Bronco's last Monday night. The final was 42-7, and it wasn't really that close. If anybody beats Pittsburgh they do it early, nobody can touch them after from November through January, and that should be the case again this year. The Oilers got pasted by a hungry Seattle club last week, but San Pasterini and co. have the guns to return as a wild-card.

Cleveland has done very well for itself thus far, considering the loss of Greg Pruitt. The Browns however are in the wrong division at the wrong time, and will probably have to watch the playoffs on T.V.

Oakland, Denver and Kansas City all lost last weekend, giving San Diego a little bit of breathing room. All five teams in this division love to beat up on each other. Unless something weird happens, the Chargers should wind up 11-5 or maybe 12-4. Everyone else will come in about 8-8.

Dallas is 7-1 at the moment, with the best record in the league and they have been really nasty since that humiliation on Monday night against Cleveland. The defense continues to be mediocre, but that offense is something else again.

The Eagles and Redskins have been pleasant surprises, and both have two games left against the Cowboys. The Skins were 7-1 at this junction last year and wound up 8-8. I'm looking for a repeat performance. The Eagles have the weapons and the consistency, and should make it as a wild-card.

The Tampa Bay Buccaneers are 6-2, and have a whopping two game lead on the Vikes. Don't look for the Bucs to end up any better than 9-7, but that will be enough to win the division. The Vikings could make a race out of it, but don't hold your breath. The rest of the Central Division has become little more than an eyesore for the rest of the NFL.

Los Angeles has had all kinds of trouble with any team better than mediocre. Luckily, the Rams have enough poor opponents left on their schedule to get some post-season action. I won't be looking for them to go too far once they get there.

New Orleans is tied with the Rams at 4-4 and is second in the league in scoring. They have some momentum going into the second half, and this should carry them into the playoffs, against the Eagles.

Ghosts, goblins, witches and vampires all invaded the UMass campus this weekend bringing with them fun and craziness along with violence and vandalism.

Halloween, traditionally the wildest weekend of the year at UMass, was just as crazy as ever according to many participants and observers.

The holiday brought thousands of students together on campus and led to many incidents of violence and vandalism throughout the weekend. (story this page).

On Friday, a halloween party sponsored by the Southwest Assembly in Hampden Commons turned into a bottle throwing melee as over a thousand students attempted to enter the party after it was closed due to overcrowding.

Paul McDonald, Southwest Student Activities Advisor, said many students, who were denied entrance to the party after the maximum 400 people were admitted, began throwing bottles as they attempted to gain access to the building.

"You can't control something like that," McDonald said. "If everyone had got in, there would have been a serious hazard. The party was well planned. But, too many outsiders tried to get in."

McDonald said the party was cancelled by the UMass police after several windows were smashed and doors broken. "The police did an excellent job," He said. "It was a very good decision to stop the party at that point." UMass police reported one injury during the incident.

UMass police reported 56 criminal complaints and 14 arrests over the weekend, between Thursday night and Sunday morning. They also reported 26 people taken into protective custody, five of which were students here.

The weekend events culminated with the gathering of thousands of people in the Campus Center Saturday night. J.P. Shea, night manager of the Campus Center, estimated over 15,000 people passed through the concourse Saturday night. He said there was no major damage and described the majority of people as "well behaved."

Shea said his small staff managed to keep order and the police were called in only once, to transport an injured girl to the infirmary. He also said the Campus Center was "as dirty as I've ever seen," and said janitorial crews worked until after 6 a.m. cleaning the building.

In the dormitories most heads of residence reported vandalism but very few major problems, Wayne Burns, head of residence in Kennedy middle dormitory, said there were about 600 guests in the building, twice the normal population. He said broken glass and fire alarms were the major problems, as did heads of residences in most other dormitories.

Most vandalism was reported to have been caused by outsiders and violence were less severe this year than in the past. They also expressed appreciation to students and staff who manned the security positions, and credited them with keeping things under control.

Police report rape on campus

By KAREN LIBUCHA
Collegian Staff

A Sunderland man was arrested early Saturday morning and charged with raping a UMass student on campus UMass police said yesterday. He was also charged with assault and battery on two counts.

Steven W.R. White was arrested in pursuit at 5:48 a.m. Saturday by UMass police soon after the crime was committed. The suspect was arraigned at Hampshire District Court Saturday and was released on $5,000 bail, police said.

The victim was from one of the dormitories, police said. But the assailant was not a student, police said, and the victim did not know her assailant.

Police would not release any further information surrounding the crime, including its location. But police did say the victim was hospitalized, although her condition was not known.

There were a total of 56 criminal complaints, including 26 protective custodies, on campus between 3 p.m. Thursday and 3 p.m. Sunday, police said. Of the protective custodies, five were UMass-Amherst students and two were UMass Boston students. The remainder were visitors on campus.

There were 197 other emergency calls, police said, but no details were released because of incomplete paperwork.

Police said a crowd of people were throwing glass bottles from the top of Hampden snack bar in the Southwest Residential Area Friday night, causing a party there to close early and the cancellation of a party and theatrical performance Saturday night.

In order to get an injured person out of Hampden Friday night police said they had to use a wedge formation to block the victim form the breaking glass.

Extra police forces from UMass-Worcester and the Hampshire County Sheriff department were called in to help control the crimes on campus this Halloween weekend.

Police said they only took from three to six hours off this weekend resulting in an "extremely tired" force by Sunday.

DIGEST

China's Chairman Hua Guofeng inspects regiments with a Coldstream Guard. (AP Laserphoto)

Britain welcomes Guofeng

LONDON —Britain, seeking to impress Premier Hua Guofeng with its potential as an important trading partner, mounted a glittering royal welcome yesterday for the Chinese communist leader.

Queen Elizabeth's Lord in Waiting — Lord Mowbray, Seagrave and Stourton — was in the airport welcoming delegation, along with Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher, who has not so honored previous visiting dignitaries. An honor contingent from the Coldstream Guards armed forces unit also was present.

The premier and Communist Party chairman arrived in London after a weeklong visit to West Germany. He is to confer twice with Mrs. Thatcher, a vocal critic of the Soviet Union, and is expected to feel more free to lash out at the Kremlin than he did during his just-completed West German visit. West Germany, a supporter of detente, had asked him to tone down his anti-Soviet remarks.

FTC may lose some power

WASHINGTON (AP) —Congress is preparing to trim the sails of the Federal Trade Commission, which many businesses say imposes too many regulations on them.

The House is expected to approve early this week a bill that would make every industry regulation by the FTC subject to congressional veto. Under the proposal, either house of Congress could block any regulation as long as the other house did not vote in favor of the regulation.

The legislative veto, contained in a bill authorizing funds for the FTC, is proposed as a way to give Congress a tighter rein over what many members see as an agency that has been too aggressive in protecting consumers from unfair business practices.

In other votes expected this week, the Senate will consider emergency aid for starving Cambodians and the House will take up a part of President Carter's energy program and will debate whether to expand the federal role in welfare programs administered by the states.

MBTA head: More security

BOSTON (AP) —The head of Boston's mass transit system ordered security beefed up yesterday and warned his employees about lax conditions.

Robert Foster, chairman of the Massachusetts Bay Transportation Authority, issued the get-tough orders after spending six hours touring the system Saturday.

"Although I have ridden the MBTA system many times since my appointment, I was disheartened at the many evidences of laxity and poor security that I witnessed yesterday," Foster said.

Foster's tour coincided with publicity about the harassment of two teen-age girls cornered by a group of boys at the Fields Corner subway station in Dorchester.

Korean CIA chief plotted President Park's assassination

By TERRY A. ANDERSON
Associated Press

SEOUL, South Korea — President Park Chung-hee and five bodyguards were gunned down deliberately in an assassination planned and executed by the head of the South Korean Central Intelligence Agency, the government said yesterday.

The official report said KCIA chief Kim Jae-kyu killed Park Friday night because he was out of favor and feared he would be fired. It did not explain why the government first reported that Kim killed the president accidentally during an argument with chief presidential body guard Cha Chishul.

"Kim was reprimanded by Park on several occasions for incompetence in carrying out his duties. There was recently talk of a reshuffle of top posts. So Kim, worried about his dismissal, committed the crime," chief investigator Chon Doohwan told reporters. He said Kim shot Park and Cha three times each during a dinner at a KCIA building 500 yards from the presidential palace.

By prior arrangement with Kim, five KCIA agents waiting in an adjoining room killed four presidential bodyguards and seriously wounded another as soon as they heard Kim's shots, Gen. Chon said. Kim, his five agents and many other KCIA agents have been arrested and were being interrogated, he said.

The government has denied that Kim planned a coup and U.S. officials in Seoul said, "We have not seen the type of events normally associated with a coup attempt, such as mass arrests and seizure of communications facilities."

Despite apparent calm in the nation of 37 million, martial law continued under acting President Choi Kyu-hah, who was Park's prime minister.

Close to 12,000 troops were posted throughout the capital, the usual midnight to 4 a.m. curfew was expanded to 10 p.m. to 4 a.m., unauthorized public gatherings were prohibited, and the news media were under military censorship.

Korean sources predicted a leadership crisis following the death of Park, who left no clear successor and tolerated no political rivals after he took power in a military coup on May 16, 1961.

But even leaders opposed to Park's authoritarian regime publicly mourned him and warned Communist North Korea to take no belligerent action during a possible leadership crisis.

Korean opposition leader Kim Yong, political foe of president Park Chung Hee in life, bows before Park's bier yesterday in Seoul. Kim's exclusion from a national assembly led to recent turbulence which may have paved the way for the assassination of Park on Friday. Story this page. (AP Laserphoto)

The Great Crash was 50 years ago

By CHET CURRIER
Associated Press

NEW YORK —American life was everything new in 1929, a carnival of fast cars and faster money, speakeasies, radio, lipstick and people who sat on flagpoles.

But 50 years ago today, the Great Crash on Wall Street sadly exposed that vision as a bathtub gin mirage.

In the popular memory, the pivotal date of that richestoraags transformation was Black Tuesday, Oct. 29, 1929, when Wall Street was in the midst of the severest market decline in its history.

"Selling began as soon as the market opened and in huge volume," wrote John Kenneth Galbraith in his book "The Great Crash 1929."

"Repeatedly and in many issues there was a plethora of selling orders and no buyers at all."

The crash wiped out fortunes, large and small, faster than the New York Stock Exchange ticker tape, running two an a half hours late, could record the damage.

For all its hysteria, though, Black Tuesday was just one in a long sequence of events that ushered in the decade-long Depression of the 1930s.

Most observers looking back today agree that the Roaring '20s, with their rampant optimism, had sown the seeds for the crash by encouraging wild stock market speculation on borrowed money.

The mood was expressed by President Calvin Coolidge, who declared in a Dec. 4, 1928, message to Congress: "No Congress of the United States ever assembled, on surveying the state of the Union, has met with a more pleasing prospect than that which appears at the present time."

Unique Management Intern MBA Program

This outstanding educational plan involves six months of classes; followed by a six-month internship of paid professional work experience; then nine more months of classwork.

The internship concept, which Northeastern pioneered, gives you practical, real-world experience in your own field of interest. It helps you pay for your education. And it often leads to important contacts for the future.

Classes begin in June and January.

Gibbs inaugurated at Amherst

By GAYLE YOUNG and ANNE CRONIN
Collegian Staff

Calling for the continued advancement of liberal arts education and the money to finance it, Julian Gibbs was inaugurated as the 15th president of Amherst College yesterday.

Gibbs, who has been praised by many as a scholar of merit and an astute administrator, replaced former Amherst president John Ward in July after an extensive search. College trustees, who chose Gibbs, said they were looking for an alumni with a strong academic background and the ability to manage a major fund-raising drive the college is planning for the next few years.

Gibbs, class of '46, officially received the charter and seal of the College from the hands of Trustee Chairman George L. Shinn, during the cermony, which was held in the school's new gymnasium. Dozens of distinguished academians in traditional robes, including UMass presidnet DavidC. Knapp, shared the stage with Gibbs.

Gibbs told an audience of 300 that Amherst need to become more involved in the areas of non-western civilization, applied mathamatics, visual arts and molecular biology, in order to provide students with an up-to-date liberal arts education. Gibbs also advocated alternatives to traditional methods of teaching. "Amherst has done much to get away from lecture," Gibbs said. "But, we have to be on guard against reverting to old habits.

"we must convey the need for students to acquire new knowledge and revise the old," he said.

Gibbs was preceeded on the podium by Richard R. Baxter, judge of the international court of justice at The Hauge. After praising the abilities of Gibbs, who he has been friends with for 30 years, Baxter turned and blasted government controls of institutions of higher education.

Baxter warned against government quotas for admitting students. "It is no violation of the constitution if (colleges) avoid quotas and just take into account an applicant's race and sex," Baxter said.

He also warned against proposed bills — which would screen college research projects involving humans, which make the grading of standardized tests public and freedom of information legislation which allows student and faculty to see their records — all of which he said would undermine the quality of higher education.

Baxter said, "I'm not proposing immunity," but said the "state should respect the autonomy of the university." He said "the trend to legislate and regulate ultimately leads to the state being the center of powers."

Gibbs earned his Ph.D in physical chemistry from Princeton University in 1950. He worked in a private industry for several years and was on the faculty of Brown University. He has received two Fulbright Fellowships, a Guggenheim Fellowship and a NATO Fellowhsip.

Within the past two years UMass, Amherst, Hampshire College, Smith College and Mount Holyoke College — which make up the five college community — have all installed new presidents. Each has praised the five college system and vowed to work towards its further development.

Local rally held for three women

By ROB STEIN
Collegian Staff

About 200 people gathered at Amherst Commons Saturday afternoon to show support for three black women arrested and charged with disorderly conduct at Russell's Liquor Store in Amherst on Sept. 29.

Speaking in front of a brown and white sign which read, "Smash White Supremacy," Sheila Jones, one of the women charged, said, "It's time the people in the Pioneer Valley cleaned up their own back yard.

"They messed with the wrong sisters and I told them that over and over again," she said.

The three women involved, Ada Griffin, a Hampshire College student, Gina Stevens, an Amherst College student and Jones, an Amherst College librarian claim they were unjustifiably brutalized by the Amherst Police who arrested them.

William Russell, package store owner, denied the charges that the three women were physically attacked.

Lloyd Hogan, Professor of Economics at Hampshire College said, "This is just one of a series of incidents that have taken place in this valley. This is nothing new.

"These three young women must be protected physically at all costs both in the courts and outside of them. This meeting will be a farce unless we come out with a course of action."

Lisa Gaughran, a member of the Political Prisoners Support Committee said, "This kind of incident encourages an atmosphere of fear and distrust."

Rally organizers urged the audience to show their continued support by attending the women's trial set for Nov. 21.

Bonnie Raitt brings her glow to the FAC

By LARRY COHEN
Collegian Staff

If an enthusiastic audience is any sign of a good concert, then Bonnie Raitt definitely had the glow last night, playing before a capacity crowd at the Fine Arts Center.

Obviously enjoying herself as much as the audience, Raitt joked with the crowd between songs, and had everyone laughing as much as they applauded.

Raitt played a lot of material from her new album, "The Glow," including the title cut, which she described as "a different kind of glow...not the radioactive kind, for sure!"

Raitt, a dedicated opponent of nuclear energy, brought up the subject several times throughout the night. Introducing her song "Give It Up," she applauded the efforts of local people like activist Sam Lovejoy of Montague, who are "keeping nuclear power out of this part of the state."

One highpoint of the concert was the stirring ballad, "Angel from Montgomery," which Raitt dedicated to "the women who live here, and the women and men they love."

Showing great poise and stage presence, she laughed when a speaker fell over onstage during one of her songs.

Birthright offered as alternative

By DONNA SULLIVAN
Collegian Staff

"Abortion is so available that many girls don't understand that there are alternatives—they do not think too much about it until after they have had one," said Faith Sullivan, a Birthright counselor.

Birthright, celebrating its fourth anniversary in November, is a service organization in Springfield offering women with unwanted pregnancies an alternative to abortion.

The Pioneer Valley chapter is part of a world-wide group of Birthright organizations. Birthright directors say it is a non-profit, non-denominational, private organization. The Pioneer Valley chapter, located at Mercy Hospital in Springfield, is composed of about 40 active members and hundreds of interested supporters.

They say workers must complete a training program that consists of attending workshops and training on a one to one basis with a counselor.

According to Josephine Sears, who is on the board of directors of Birthright, there is not one paid Birthright worker "anywhere in the world."

Sears, a registered nurse and pediatrics instructor at Springfield Technical Community College, said that in reality a woman has the right over her body, but the fetus is a unique, individual human being.

"The baby has its own complete circulatory system and its own type of blood. Four days after conception, the sex can be determined under a microscope. Eighteen to 25 days after conception, most women do not even know they are pregnant and the baby already has a detectible heartbeat," Sears said.

"We are not talking about a glob of protoplasm. We are talking about a little boy or girl—it is the right of every child to be born," she said.

Sears said Birthright helps women with unwanted pregnancies to ease their burden.

According to Sullivan, Birthright is an emergency pregnancy counseling operation which offers free services to anyone who calls or visits. Birthright provides shelter homes, maternity clothes and directions for financial help and, if necessary, adoption agencies. There are also doctors on the staff, Sullivan said.

Birthright offers each woman a friendship counselor to help her cope with the situation. The friendship counselor takes a woman to her doctor appointments and keeps in close contact with her, Sullivan said.

"We try to be supportive but we do not recommend abortion. We feel that girls are not making an intelligent decision when they have an abortion. They do not understand what is happening and they need counseling. A girl should know what the risks are," Sullivan said.

According to Sears, sometimes there are medical and psychological complications to abortions and it has been documented that there may be complications in subsequent pregnancies. Women who have had abortions have become sterile, or have had babies born that are premature or stillborn in later pregnancies. In addition, nine percent of the women who have abortions can expect severe, prolonged psychological damage, Sears said.

Birthright was founded by Louise Summerhill of Toronto who found that advertisements for abortions were one-sided. Summerhill thought that some women felt trapped and started to publicize alternatives.

The Pioneer Valley chapter, according to Sears, has as few fundraising activities as possible. "We use our energies for the women who need us, but from time to time we need the money to function," she said.

According to Sears, the group does not deal with birth control or sterilization and is not involved with political or lobbying groups.

"We are a pro-life organization that believes all life is sacred," Sullivan said. "We provide friendship, love and caring to a girl in an unfortunate situation. Abortion is very available but that does not mean that it is right," she said.

Rabbi mimes women heros

By SERENA RICHARD
Collegian Staff

Rabbi Lynn Gottlieb mimed, danced and sang about biblical women of the desert last night in the final performance of a Jewish Women's week series.

In Review

The young, barefoot rabbi performed for an audience of 45 people in the Campus Center Auditorium for 50 minutes and then opened the floor up for responses.

Gottlieb explained that most rabbis limit roles of women to sisters and mothers of male characters in their biblical accounts. "I'm trying to place biblical women back into the stories as prophets and figures of strength through my work," she said.

Gottlieb is affiliated with the Congregation for the Deaf in New York City and is the founder of the Bat Kol Players mime troup. She has traveled around the United States, Canada, and Israel presenting "Portraits of Biblical Women."

Her performance last night concentrated on the deeds of Miriam, Mosses' sister, and her strength in leading the Jews out of Egypt to freedom.

"I want people to realize that she wasn't just standing around and dancing the hora but served a real purpose in the story," said Gottlieb.

During the response period, Gottlieb invited the audience to join hands in a circle and practice a chant used to celebrate Rosh Chodosh, a Jewish celebration of the first day of every month.

Jennifer Wexler, Hillel spokesperson, said she thinks the Jewish women's week has been a great success. "It's really important for Jewish women to come together and look at their identities," she said.

"From an increased sense of identity, Jewish women can stand up to anti-semitism and sexism, both within and outside of the Jewish faith,"

She said the program was sponsored by B'nai B'rith Hillel, Everywomen's Center, Southwest women's Center, Resources Judaica, and the Distinguished Visitors Program.

Halloween party less than good time

Editor's note: The following is a personal account by a student who worked security at Hampden Commons on Friday during a Halloween party.

I helped work security at the Southwest Halloween party in Hampden Commons Friday night. I thought it would be a good time and looked forward to the evening with great excitement.

Instead of a good time the evening turned into a bizarre nightmare, exceeding my wildest imagination.

After a peaceful start, the excited, drunken crowd began to grow and the doors were locked after the maximum capacity of 400 people was reached.

Those locked outside grew noisy and soon became violent. First, bottles were thrown at the building and then the doors were ripped open and mobs of people attempted to enter, accompanied by a hail of bottles and cans.

I was struck twice by beer containers and several bottles shattered within inches of me. Other students guarding the doors were also struck but by some miracle no one was injured by the attack.

The police, who had responded in force to a frantic call of help, cancelled the party at the height of the disturbance.

After the mob had broken through the doors and filled the room, the police began to clear them out. It took a while, and after the building was cleared, the police stood on the steps of the building, while the crowd in the courtyard continued their assault with bottles and debris.

Finally, at 1 a.m. those of us who had been working inside managed to escape through a back door to safety. It was a long, tiring evening and it was amazing that no one was seriously injured. But, the UMass Police had acted quickly to prevent a dangerous situation from becoming lethal.

Entertaining greed

Stephen Nojeim

Recently, in keeping up a long family tradition, Joseph P. Kennedy, son of Robert, blasted big business for its greed. Oil and coal industry profits, he said, are a result of greed and lack of concern for "the people." Who are "the people"? You and I. American consumers who have certain needs and who realize that we must pay to have them fulfilled. Like our need for entertainment.

It is so strong that we pay actors, actresses and professional athletes salaries of hundreds of thousands of dollars for their services. Do we not need oil? And do we not need it more than we do entertainment? After all, without the energy to run our industries, no one will be able to afford entertainment because no one will be working. It seems logical that those offering the most valuable services are deserving of the highest salaries.

But if you still believe that oil executives' salaries are too high, then it must be true. "The people" are always right. If oil companies were owned and operated by "the people," we'd be much better off. Let's nationalize the country's energy producers. Let's walk in with clubs and guns and wire cutters and occupy Exxon and the rest. Let's do it for "the people."

I hate to disappoint you but we're about 60 years too late. The oil companies have beaten us to it. They've voluntarily nationalized themselves. How? Through the stock market. Yes, anyone who wishes may own part of an oil company. And part of the profits, too. The oil executives are there for two main reasons: to supply the country with oil and the stockholders with profits. Who are the stockholders? "The people." And who are "the people"? You and I. There is not much room—or need—for any more nationalization than that. As "the people" of the richest nation on earth finally begin to pay their fair share at the gasoline pumps, all the oil company profits come back to us, "the people," through stock dividends.

My advice to those of you who are now confused is to stop wasting your money on education. Invest in something more worthwhile, like oil stocks. Then you can sit at home and watch your profits grow. Or watch television instead. It won't be long before you devise a surefire plan to nationalize actors, actresses and professional athletes.

With so little overhead their profits are sure to be more lucrative than those of the oil companies. In addition, there seems to be no end to the supply.

Editorial/Opinion

French 'mis-connection'

Gabriel Frayne

It is an intriguing matter of historical coincidence that one of this continent's three official languages has long been a decidely junior partner to the others. In fact, Americans who have grown smug in their mass-culture embryo sometimes even forget that there are three official languages this side of the Atlantic.

That may soon change. Believing themselves to be "the white niggers of North America," as one author put it, a formidable number of French Quebecers are pushing to have their status drastically upgraded in the very near future. Sometime next spring, the Quebec electorate will vote on a referendum which, if passed, will give Quebec's ruling party a mandate to negotiate independence from the rest of Canada. And while all of the major parties outside of Quebec have expressed resolute opposition to any independent status for the nation's largest province, none has laid down any counter strategy other than effusive nail-biting should the referendum pass.

Why this French rebellion in a hemisphere that is supposed to be free of "balkanism?" Certainly, the numbers tell part of the story: French is the language of 80 percent of all Quebecers, but only about one quarter of all Candains and less than 2 percent of North Americans. Suffice it to say, the French independence movement appears to be predicated on a belief that Quebec's union with Canada was consumated as a marriage of convenience, and that this marriage's original justification has now almost entirely vanished.

On a recent trip to Montreal, I had the opportunity to interview a deputy of the separatist Parti Quebecois. Gilbert Paquette represents Montreal's Rosemont district in the provincial legislature, and evidence of his constituency's bedrock support is provided by the abundance of fleur-de-lis flags and separatist slogans which adorn the working-class streets surrounding his office. I was favorably impressed, incidentally, with Mr. Paquette's English. Much as the separatists' rhetoric may engender fears of cultural hegemony among English quebecers, bilingualism is "de riguer" within the Parti Quebecois.

GF: Do you see Quebec as a synthesis of cultures, or does the PQ want to reorient Quebec to its Gaullic heritage?

P: We consider ourselves a different nation, the only one that hasn't acquired sovereignty in all the Americas. All the Spanish, Portugese and English colonies finally managed to have their own sovereignty. We think this is more important for Quebec because we are in an English-speaking environment, and so Quebec is the homeland of all francophones (the Candian term for those of French ancestry) in North America. ...Under sovereignty, French would be the language of communication between allethnic groups, but each group would maintain its own identity, including the British minority.

GF: How do you respond to charges of chauvinism from your opponents?

P: To say that there is here a nation that is one of the last in the world without sovereignty doesn't mean a closing of attitude. On the contrary, it means that we want to get the means to open up to other people. ..Ther are two nations in Canada. Federalists like to say that this is a theory, but it is not a theory it is a fact.

GF: To what extent is the independence issue a class issue?

P: A special characteristic here is that the business community was foreign, was always looked on as foreign, from the point of view of francophone Quebecers. We don't really have a capitalist class in Quebec that is francophone. The issue is quite blatant, and it is not suprising that the issue of Quebec sovereignty has been taken up by a party that is social democratic.

GF: It is often said that Quebec's lack of economic development is a result of its own traditionally church-oriented educational system. Do you find this belief false or insulting?

GF: It is often said that Quebec's lack of economic development is a result of its own traditionally

P: No, it is not false or insulting, but it is a bit short-sighted. I don't know of any nation that has submitted under the force of arms and that has acquired command of the economic field. Quebec developed into two distinct societies, the English minority taking the economic field, and theFrench majority grouping itself around the priests and agriculture until quite recently — I would say the 1950's or 60's.

GF: How will a soveriegn Quebec deal with the extensive American influence, or "branch plant" economy?

P: By using the government possibility, or the financial corporative movement possibility, to develop a sector of the economy that is free from the branch plant economy. It might amount to some nationalization, but we don't see that as penalty on civil liberties. (Paquette went on to explain that a sovereign Quebec government would also take control of the credit sector, as is now the case in the rest of Canada.)

Racism to stop racists?

Jim Moran

The recent wave of confrontation between Jewish and Third World groups is a most inconsiderate and unfortunate development. Inconsiderate, because the hostility created in the wake of the firing of Andrew Young ignores the historical alliance formerly held between these two seriously oppressed communities. Unfortunate because its existence leads to a further drawing of lines between members of the one race that matters most—the human race.

Andrew Young was an articulate, if often misunderstood figure in politics. He injected a sense of healthy controversy and reality into a world of diplomacy previously smothering in deceit, misdirection and protocol. But the fact remains that he lied about his meeting with members of the Palestinian Liberation Organization, a group which, for good or evil, the United States fails to recognize at this point in time. His dismissal by President Carter, although perhaps not warranted, was justifiable. Any attempts by the blacks and pro-Palestinians to project the blame for that action upon the Jewish community is pointless.

Besides which, what the black community seems to forget too easily is the involvement of liberal Jewish people in the formative years of their civil rights movement. Morris Abram, former president of Brandeis University, and member of the Board of Directors of the United Negro College Fund stated in September that the Jewish community donated some $2 million to the Southern Christian Leadership Conference over the years. Without that financial support, where would have Ralph David Abernathy, Martin Luther King Jr. and Andrew Young have gone?

I would be naive if I said that Jewish support was solely responsible for the success of the black civil rights effort, but the support was not insignificant either.

Now we see a real affinity developing between Arabs and blacks as "Third World comrades." Both groups charge that Zionism is a racist, repressive movement. This line of propaganda is not new. It was promulgated by the United Nations resolution in 1976, equating Zionism with racism. But merely because it had the support of a united, self-serving Third World bloc at the UN does make it truth. And what has developed since that time is far worse. For a growing sense of hatred and fear of so-called "Jewish Power" has surfaced.

Now, on our campus, the UMass Iranian-Muslim Association has begun its participation in the anti-Jewish movement. When they handed out literature in the Campus Center concourse two weeks ago, a pamphlet entitled "The Masters of the Media," they denied espousing anti-Jewish rhetoric, preferring instead to label themselves "anti-Zionist." Then, on October 22, the Iranian students visited the Collegian offices, demanding a correction from our paper that "we" take back what "they" said, now claiming that they are not "anti-Zionist." What are they then?

Perhaps some examples from their booklet on Jewish media monopoly might give us an indication so we can form our own opinions:

"Since the beginning of this century, when Jewish mercantile power in America became a dominant economic force, there has been a steady rise in the number of American newspapers in Jewish hands, accompanied by a steady decline in the number of competing Gentile newspapers—primarily as a result of selective advertising policies by Jewish merchants." Are not Jewish merchants also Americans? Are they any less entitled to involvement in the processes of a free press? Aside from this claim of Jewish monies and their inter-connection with advertising revenues, the Iranian pamphlet goes on to claim that Jews actually infiltrate influential media organizations, such as the New York Times and Washington Post, declaring that they can "make and break" politicians "at their pleasure, as Watergate has so clearly shown." The mere notion that Jews, and not illegal and corruptive individuals like Haldeman, Ehrlichman led to the demise of President Nixon is preposterous. But there's more.

"Until this Jewish contol of American public opinion is broken, continued misfortune, confusion and decadence shall be our lot, and there can be no national liberation or regeneration." How would these student "liberators" propose we "break" this Jewish control? One can't help but shudder at the prospect of their solution.

But it failed to mention that the Rockefellers own CBS, that the Ford Foundation donates large sums of money to public broadcasting as do the Carnegies and the Mellons, all White Anglo-Saxon Protestant powers.

The "Masters of the Media" booklet also failed to mention Hearst, a Catholic who owns a very large chain of newspapers and electronic media outlets. It fails to mention that the majority of editors in city rooms across the country are white, non-Jewish males. Are these people any less influential in shaping the news?

And even if these Iranian nationalists had their way, if every Jew was eliminated from the face of the earth, an occurence one supposes they would ecstacize over, who would they replace as a more benevolent source of power—Ayatollah Khomeini? There's a civilized idea. These fervent Iranian-Muslim followers can hardly claim that Iran has fared any better with the shah's deposition. Not when, during the first month of the new regime, 11 men can be executed as homosexuals in secret trials without defense. Not when, during the same time, 57 others can be slaughtered for political and sex crimes by the Islamic revolutionary courts. Not when they treat their women citizenry as second-class citizens, forbidding them the freedom to dress in the clothes of their choice despite protestations. Not when they ban music as a force "conducive to violence and counter-revolution." And not when they kick the press out of their nation, as they did this September, when journalists were forced to accept official "government-line" broadcasts over Radio Tehran.

The present government of Iran seems positioned on a dangerous course. Self-determination the Third World screams. But when they butcher their own people, are they worthy of choosing their own government? There has to be a force that supercedes all cultures and governments for the sake of preserving humanity. If that means intervention or imperialism, then so be it.

The Third World is right when they decry racism. Any actions or words which pit human beings against each other have no place on the face of this planet. But when one uses racism as a means of stifling the same, a dark and cracked pane of glass is in the window of our existence.

Hitch-hiking: why not catch an idea?

Debbie Wallace

Once the buses have stopped, I cannot get a ride from campus to Brittany Manor. I usually walk home when the temperature is not severe—but when the winds shoot through me, my only recourse is hitch-hiking.

Each time I mention to someone that I was hitchhiking especially at night, around midnight, or 1 a.m. my friends give me the usual speech on the dangers of hitchhiking. It would be a welcome relief, instead of a speech, if I were given a ride by compassionate students or other women.

There are definite patterns to hitchhiking. If women pick up riders they are usually men and men (one or more) will usually pick up a woman hitchhiker.

Last week I was graciously offered a ride by two gentlemen in their early 50's.

In a campus community it would be a relief if students would give rides to other students, and save them from the horrors of the well-talked about rapist or crazed person who picks up hitchhikers and brutalizes them.

The problem would be remedied if the bus service was extended on week ends and week nights to at least once an hour at 1 a.m. and 2 a.m. On an extremely cold night it is a torturous feeling to walk four miles, with no cars in sight, and to know that if a car does approach, there is a great possibility you may not make it home—safely.

So women should start pulling for other women and look out for one another to prevent potential rapes. People who live in apartment complexes should not ignore the hitchhiker who just walked out of the apartment next door. Perhaps car pools are a good solution.

I have met many interesting students while I have been hitchhiking this semester, but the terror that stirs in my heart would be decreased if I was offered a ride by a woman more than once in three months.

Debbie Wallace is Associate's Women's Editor.

Physical plant: To catch a duck

To the Editor:

I must express my utter disgust in the manner of which physical plant workers went about capturing the two resident campus swans for the purpose of sheltering them for the winter months.

For a full hour, no less than eight men, a truck, a van, tractor and small powered motor-boat were utilized in accomplishing this annual feat. The physical plant's performance was not only a costly and timely event, but a frightening, exhausting terror for the two birds.

On several occasions I have fed these birds out of the palm of my hand.

It frightens me that all the work and effort involved could been replaced by a generous handful of bagel crumbs.

Mark Moran: This is your life

To the Editor:

I would like to respond to Mark Moran's letter of 10/24 concerning Lisa Capone's "Catholic Woman's Life." He failed to describe his own view which I will do for him.

An adolescent male of questionable morality would of course, eschew the subversive dangers of sex education in favor of more edifying sources, say "Screw" magazine or his drooling cousin Harold. After sleeping with himself until the age of thirty-six, he begins his quest for the "unused woman," which proves, of course, futile since any woman with the sense not to allow herself to be used would avoid loitering within brick-throwing range of this moron.

Our lad is eventually forced to settle for an unused car (one with a stickshift, of course) which he employs in the pursuit of "morality," i.e. gay-bashing, commie-crunching, and the ever-popluar intimidation of female pedestrians.

Not to worry, though, with any luck this dolt is still too ignorant to reproduce.

Thank goodness for small favors.

Is it a question of missing money?

To the Editor:

I would like to inform University of Massachusetts students of the existence of a scholarship fund which they may not be aware, It is the Faculty Union Scholarship Trust Fund. According to a financial statement which I was able to pry out of the MSP office this fund has $4,462.26 in it.

Except for the interest which it has earned while sitting idle, the money in the fund was contributed by faculty members who are not members of the union but are conscientious objectors. Although we started contributing to the fund in March, 1979, I have been unable to learn the names of any students who have benefitted from it.

I have not seen any public announcement by MSP of the existence of this fund or of the considerable sum which is now in it. Some of us who doubt the sincerity of the heroes of MSP wonder what the primary purpose of the so-called "union scholarship" is.

Is it really to help students or is it a means of harassing faculty members who do not wish to join the union?

Lewis M. Killian

Contributions actually quite irrelevant

To the Editor:

I would like to correct some distortion in Elved Owen's article [10/23] on Bernadette Devlin-McAliskey and on the current situation in my country.

Ms. McAliskey did not request or collect money for armed struggle in Northern Ireland as your correspondent suggested. [Check recordings of Hampshire/U. Mass. meetings]. On the contrary, the fabulous sum of $140 [collected at U. Mass.] is being used to defray her expenses in a recent electoral campaign for the European Parliament. The focus of that campaign was on the torture of political prisoners by the British in N. Ireland. [torture substantiated by Amnesty, International Court of Human Rights etc.]

Owen's concern about contributing money for violence is admirable though irrelevar in the McAliskey case. One wonders indeed if Owens liberal concern on this issue of violence is consistent across the board. How many liberals sleep very well at night while their taxes pad the U.S. War Budget?

Finally, I trust the American experience of independence from Britain helps people in this country sympathise with the right of the Irish people to self-determination after 800 long years of colonialism. Only when Britain withdraws her troops and Ireland is independent will there be a bases for a just and lasting peace in what is now England's Vietnam.

Mairead Casey

In support of Capone's column

To the Editor:

Contrary to the abundance of negative responses to Lisa Capone's editorial about the Pope, here is a positive one.

The Catholic Church, no doubt, has a massive following. Just as other good Catholics, I have followed the path to Holy Communion and Confirmation. When I was young, it was the only "thing" to do. We all wanted to be good Catholics because we knew of no other way.

Now, as an older and wiser individual, I have a mind of my own which allows me to make my decisions as I see fit. I no longer blindly accept the Church's responses to many social issues. While I don't abandon the values of the Church which I grew up with, I allow myself the opportunity to decide.

The Catholic Church succeeded in shaping my values, and on a larger scale, it has a propaganistic potential to shape everyone elses.

If today's society emphasizes the importnace of the individual, then we must question the power one institution has to monopolize our daily lives.

Ms. Capone's editorial was merely questioning the power of an institution—the Church—over the power on the inidividual.

N.L. Maffucci

More criticism of Owen's column

To the Editor:

In response to Elved Owens' editorial on Ms. Devlin's lecture on Northern Ireland, I would like to point out three things. First, every nation that was colonized by the British Empire had two alternatives to which to seek freedom: 1. Wait and hope that the expense of maintaining a colonial empire becomes to great an expense to be economically feasible or, 2. take up arms and fight.

Well the Irish have been waiting for 800 years.

Second: History shows that violent revolution DOES offer a solution to Imperialism and sometimes it is the only course to which an Imperialist government will respond. Third: Your article, Mr. Owens, epitomizes the point Ms. Devlin was trying to make when she said that the violence of the oppressors is met with silence but let the oppressed fight back and they are labled 'Murdering Bastards'.

Collegian magazine 'rather dull...'

To the Editor:

Last Thursday, I was pleased to see that the Collegian had included a fine-arts magazine as a supplement to the paper. However, when I read it, I was rather disappointed. Expecting to read Below the Salt, as I have on various Thursdays over the past three years, I found instead a rather dull example of the People magazine genre. Gone were Below the SAlt's varied and opinionated record, film, and book reviews which always influenced my purchasing habits and recreational activities.

Instead, I read articles on trends in pop music or the latest movie fare for mass consuption — just general articles, not well-written, educated reviews. Please give us back Below the Salt, or at least more record and film review and a more informative magazine.

Plane crash kills girl, injures others in Mass.

CONCORD, Mass. (AP) —A 12-year-old girl was killed and three other family members injured seriously yesterday when a single-engine plane carrying them in a drizzle slammed into an unoccupied house near the center of Concord, the State Police said.

State Trooper Richard Lauria said the injured were a man, his wife and another daughter.

Emerson Hospital authorities were withholding their identities until their next of kin can be identified, said the trooper. A hospital spokesman said the father was listed as the pilot and that the dead girl was 12.

"My sister went out and discovered a plane had crashed right into the house," said Joanne Lloyd, who was visiting her sister, Mrs. Wilfred H. Monsen, in a neighboring house on Monsen Road near the center of town. "She said it struck the rear porch.

"She heard people screaming and she called the police. She first heard what sounded like a clipping of trees but she did not hear any engine."

Colts down Patriots, 31-26

By GORDON BEARD
Associated Press

BALTIMORE — Joe Washington scored his third touchdown on a 12-yard sweep with 4:51 remaining as the Baltimore Colts, their offense rejuvenated under Bert Jones, defeated the New England Patriots 31-26 in a National Football League game yesterday.

The Patriots, who entered the game leading the American Conference East with a 6-2 record, drove to the Baltimore 2 before linebacker Ed Simonini deflected a fourth down Steve Grogin pass with 40 seconds remaining to preserve Baltimore's third victory in nine games. Simonini also stopped Grogin after a twoyard run on the previous play.

Jones completed 17 of 30 passes for 280 yards, including a seven-yarder to Washington which gave the Colts a 24-13 lead early in the third quarter.

New England, aided by a roughing-the-kicker penalty and a fumble recovery, scored on field goals of 42 and 39 yards by John Smith in the third period and then went ahead 26-24 on a eight-yard run by Grogin with 7:14 left.

Minutewomen swamp Yale with four first half goals

By ROB EMMONS
Collegian Staff

It wouldn't be surprising if whoever coined the adage "No news is good news" was a supporter of the UMass women's soccer team. Saturday's 5-0 thumping of visiting Yale was as typical a Minutewomen victory as they come. For instance, Natalie Prosser collected her third hat trick in the past six games, UMass kicked nearly twice as many shots as the opponents, and, as usual, it took time for the scoring to commence.

Nearly a dozen minutes elapsed before Prosser's first goal put the Minutewomen on top to stay. The balance of the hat trick plus Margie Anderson's unassisted tally staked UMass to a 4-0 halftime lead. Elaine Contant added a goal late in the second period to account for the final. Coach Morse was pleased to observe that communication between his players is improving.

This Tuesday, October 30th, marks the final opportunity for taking in a home game. The Minutewomen will host a competitive Harvard squad at 3:00 on the NOPE field.

Women spikers win one, lose one over weekend

By MAUREEN SULLIVAN
Collegian Staff

The women's volleyball team had its ups and downs over the Halloween weekend as they split two matches. The team downed Mount Holyoke College 15-8, 15-10, 15-10 last Thursday night at Mount Holyoke, then lost its first home match in six weeks Saturday at the hands of Southern Connecticut, 11-15, 3-15, 15-9, 5-15 at NOPE gym.

Against Mount Holyoke, the Minutewomen dominated throughout the match, in spite of defense by the Lyons. Led by the ace serving of Peggy Barber and Alison Taylor, the UMass offense spiked its way to their fourth straight win.

Southern Conn. came to Amherst Saturday afternoon with a 16-8 record and Springfield College among its victims. However, Southern nearly became the victims of a UMass show of power. Led by Ellen Braun and Joyce Gresl at the net, the Minutewomen roared to a 10-1 lead. That lead quickly evaporated when the Owls came back with powerful spiking and setting to overtake UMass. The Southern domination continued throughout the second game as the SC front court overpowered whatever efforts UMass could muster.

With backs to the wall, the Minutewomen came out fighting, as they bumped, passed and set almost every spike the Owls sent over the net. Alison Taylor and Brenda Simmons helped UMass win its only game of the afternoon. SC finished the Minutewomen off with a combination of good front court blocking and spiking.

"We're very disappointed," said UMass coach Elaine Marasco after the SC match.

UMass' next match is Tuesday at the University of Hartford.

Playoff hopes in jeopardy

Huskies shock Minutemen, 24-0

By MARK MARCHAND
Collegian Staff

STORRS, CONN. — The Umass football team suffered a severe setback to its playoff hopes along with its first lost in the Yankee Conference after 14 straight victories when it was outplayed and shut out by the UConn Huskies 24-0 Saturday afternoon. The Minutemen loss to the now 2-4-1 Huskies seriously damages any chance for UMass to remain in the top four in the national Division 1-AA rankings and gain a post season playoff invitation.

Played before 10,677 at UConn's memorial Stadium, the contest saw the UConn defense hold the Minutemen running attack to just 16 yards. In the air, UMass didn't fare much better as Minutemen quarterback Mike McEvilly complete 10 of 28 passes for a total of 107 yards along with three interceptions. Added to that were the three fumbles that UMass gave up for a total of six turnovers, four of which led to UConn scores during the resulting UConn offensive series.

"This is my biggest win here," said an elated UConn third year head coach Walt Nadzak. "We were worried about getting in the hole early when UMass had good field position, but we just stuffed 'em."

The first quarter of the game gave no indication of either team dominating as both offenses couldn't get untracked with each team punting four times.

In the second quarter, however, the Huskies capitalized on a UMass turnover when UConn's Jody Webb intercepted a McEvilly pass and returned it to the Massachusetts 22 yard line. Six plays later, Huskie quarterback Al Arison delivered a three-yard pass into the hands of wide receiver Ken Sweitzer for the TD and the only six point UConn would need on the day.

Later in the second stanza, UConn again capitalized on a UMass miscue when wide receiver Jim' Ryan fumbled a pitch from McEvilly on an end-around. The ball rolled into the end zone where Huskies middle guard Gary Brooks recovered it for a TD and a 14-0 HALFTIME LEAD. Throughout the first half, the UConn defense continually hald the Minutemen in their own end of the field and out of the range of placekicker Sandro Vitiello's foot.

The third quarter was more of the same as UConn continued to make good on UMass mistakes. A McEvilly fumble on the UMass 38-yard line was recovered by Connecticut's linebacker Dewey Raymond with 2:58 left in the quarter. Helped by a roughing-the-kicker penalty on a punt play, the Huskies engineered a nine-play drive that was capped by a 22-yard Arison pass to split end L. Reginald Eccleston who carried it into the end zone to increase UConn's lead to 21-0.

A fourth quarter 28 yard field goal by Huskies placekicker Robert Segar wrapped up the UConn scoring on another offensive series set up by a UMass turnover.

Overall, Huskies quarterback Al Arison completed 11 of 27 passes for 115 yards and two touchdowns. On the ground, UConn gained 115 yards with halfback Tony Jordan carrying the ball for 95 yards.

On the field for 34 minutes of the game compared with UConn's 25, the UMass defense was led by linebacker Scott Crowell who notched nine unassisted tackles in an effort to stop the Huskies offense.

UConn, now 2-0-1 within the Yankee Conference, takes over first place from UMass by virtue of the win.

"It's really good to hear someone say that; it's been a long time," said Nadzak.

The Minutemen are now 5-2 overall with a 3-1 record in the conference. They'll be taking a few days off before beginning practice because of the open date next Saturday. On Nov. 10, UMass will return to action when they host the Holy Cross Crusaders at Alumni Stadium.

Booters fall to UConn

By MIKE ESTRADA
Collegian Staff

STORRS, Conn. — UMass played themselves proud against nationally ranked UConn here Saturday, but the persistence of the Huskie offense proved too much for the Minutemen, breaking a 2-2 tie with Joe Morrone's 19th goal near game's end to down the visitors 3-2 before 4500 fans at Gardiner Dow field.

For the second time in eight days the Minutemen have played the tenth-ranked nationally, first-rank in New England team (by virtue of URI's fall in the rankings) and played up to the standards of the opposition in every respect. Against the Huskies, the UMass offense was in top-form, netting the first goal of the contest mid-way through a sluggish first half and later tying the game at 2-2 to add some spice to the UConn homecoming game.

UMass goaltender Mark Marilla had perhaps his best day, assuredly his busiest, despite playing in considerable pain from a pulled muscle in his abdominal area, prompting UMass coach Russ Kidd to describe Marilla's effort as a "helluva gutsy performance." His seven saves and three goals allowed are not indicative of how much a factor Marilla was against UConn, staring the offensive charge with throws and kicks in the fashion he has done all year.

The bad news is UMass will not see NCAA playoff action this year as they fall to 4-4-2, with only two games remaining. "I think that (UConn) was our last shot at making the playoffs," said UMass tri-captain and 1978 all-Yankee Conference selection Mark Vassolotti. "All we can do now is enjoy the rest of the season."

Wayne Moran's sixth goal at 28:43 after a scramble in front of the UConn net was answered by Huskie Joe Morrone's first goal of the day when the All-American got a pass from Erhardt Kapp off a direct kick to beat a helpless Marilla at 31:34.

Only five minutes into the second half, UConn, entering the game with 61 goals in 18 games, scored their 63rd when senior Wilbert Cadet rifled a shot off the hands of a diving Marilla to put the Huskies up 2-1.

The Huskie offense threatened to score again several times, one a Joe Morrone shot that hit the post, but UMass and Ed Eschmann, who had his share of goal-sharing opportunities against URI, tied the game at 2-2 when the Senior took a square from Vassollotti and fired to the left corner which UConn goalie Jim Renahan (four saves off 18 UMass shots) tipped but watched helplessly roll in to the left corner of the net.

Harriers run in Penn. against field of seven

By JANE . WOLFSON
Collegian Staff

This afternoon the UMass men's cross country team takes on seven other teams at the Penn State Invitational held in College Park. This is the first year the Minutemen have participated in this race.

Also racing today will be host Penn State (the favorite to win the 5.2 mile event), Rutgers, West Virginia, Pittsburgh, University of Virginia, Cleveland State, and East Carolina.

"I don't have any first hand knowledge of some teams," said harrier coach Ken O'Brien. "But I know that Penn State, Virginia and Cleveland have outstanding teams. I would like to beat both Rutgers and West Virginia; we raced against them at the Eastern Eight meet and they narrowly beat us."

Running for UMass will be seniors Rick Walls, team captain, Paul Kirksey and Steve MacDougall, juniors Mike Doiron and Kevin Molteni, and Bob Martin, and sophomores Paul Beaulieu, Frank Prial and Dan Fitch.

"I have confidence that the kids will run well for the rest of season. We had lost our four top runners from last year, and one of our top returning runners, Mike Morris, sprained his ankle right before the start of the season and has not raced since."

"This left Walls and Doiron as our only returning runners. We were a young team and I had expect inconsistency. Physically we've made real progress, and we're running much better races. And as far as concentration goes, each meet we're getting a little better," said O'Brien.

"We've also made great progress on the initial phase of the race and I'm pleased with the end; we just need more experience in the middle of race where we're prone to lapses in concentration," he concluded.

Stickers edge Springfield

By LINDA REYER
Collegian Staff

The field hockey team beat a tough Springfield squad on its home court 1-0 Saturday when Judy Strong tallied a goal assisted by Julie McHugh during the last five minutes of the game.

The fifth-ranked stickers took eight shots on goal compared to 12th ranked Springfield's four.

Both teams showed little activity during the first half, said UMass coach Pam Hixon. "We did play at 8 a.m. During the first half, the hour showed," said Hixon.

In the second half, the stickers dominated the game by outshooting Springfield two to one.

Stickers Patty Bessie and Sue Caples were outstanding throughout the game. Bessie

This win brings the stickers record to 12-1. The stickers only loss was given to them last Wednesday when UNH beat UMass 1-0.

Although the stickers outshot UNH twenty-two to eight, they just could not get on the scoreboard. "We played well enough, we just could not score," said Hixon.

The team's inability to score was short-lived because Thursday the stickers routed Smith 11-0.

95 lb. Ada Griffin forcibly taken into custody by the Amherst Police Department

Janet Kinnane, senior History major at Mount Holyoke College was near Russell's Liquor Store, when she heard screaming. She saw two policemen drag Gina Stevens from the liquor store to the police station banging her against the curb in the process. Kinnane: I thought it was a man they were dragging the way they were handling her.

There was a crowd in front of the liquor store and inside I saw Ada on the floor with two policemen holding her down and handcuffing her. According to Janet a policeman pushed his way through the crowd, spoiling a photo of Ada on the floor. Two policemen took Ada out and Sheila Johnson followed with another.

"I went to the Police Station the next day inquiring about the arrests and was told to return the following day." Kinnane described the police as having "detached attitudes and no information."

APARTHEID: THE ISSUE IS CONTROL OF RESOURCES AND SUPPRESSION OF HUMAN RIGHTS

by Chaka Zulu
(pt. 2)

Although extremely harsh, the degree and nature of exploitation and oppression has never dampened African spirit for freedom from white foreign domination and for effective control of the country's economics and politics.

Control of South Africa's land distribution policies, the land use policies the distribution of the products, revenues and other forms of wealth derived from South Africa's Mining, agricultural and manufacturing industries is what freedom is to the Black South African.

This freedom of land and equitable distribution of wealth is what the Black South African has fought for from the beginnings of Dutch and British encroachment on his land.

Between 1779 and 1799 there were three bitter wars fought between Africans and whites as the Africans attempted to stop the land grabbing and cattle stealing practices of white foreigners. Between 1812 and 1834 three wars were fought between Africans and whites as Africans tried to prevent whites from stealing their land.

Resistance against oppression has been a continous factor in South African life. On January 8, 1912 the African National Congress (A.N.C) the oldest Liberation Organization in South Africa was founded.

In 1959 the Pan Africanist Congress was founded (as a result of a split inside of the (A.N.C.) since then the two organizations have emerged to be the strongest liberation organizations in South Africa and have continuously led the people in resistance to the White settler regime.

- 1913 the A.N.C. organized and sent a delegation to Britain to obtain British intervention by the British government (which at that time would still veto any South African Laws) against the Land act of 1913 which stripped Africans of 87 percent of their land.
- 1919 at the peace congress in France South Africans were the first to protest the handing over of South West Africa (Nambia) as a "territory to be administered by South Africa."
- 1943 an A.N.C. Youth League was formed to organize youth against the repressive regime.
- In 1949 a programme of boycotts striked and civil disobedience campaigns was adopted and put into practice.
- June 26, 1950 a national day of mourning was called; which has been commemorated (ever since) as South African freedom day in memory to the persons killed and injured implementing the resistence campaigns.
- Two years later June 26, 1952, the "Defiance of unjust Laws campaign" was launched, and it marked the beginning of a great era of resistence to white minority rule.
- 1955 Freedom day the A.N.C. organized a congress of the people, asking the masses about their freedom demands, which were later complilled into the "Freedom Charter."
- 1960 was seen as the turning point of the struggle. Such a high level of political activity on the part of Africans in the fight for freedom took place, that the ANC and the PAC were banned and the white South African government declared a state of emergency. This was the year of the "Sharpeville Massacre!"
- In 1961 after 50 years of attempts at a peaceful resolution to the conflict the ANC decided to launch armed struggle and create its military wing. shortly afterward it decided to reorganize itself to do secret underground organizing work.
- In the late 1960's and 1970's the struggle continued but under different forms and with a different type of leadership. For instance:
  - The Durban dock strike in 1969
  - The port Elizabeth bus boycott in 1971
  - The most well known was the 1976 Soweto Student uprisings and the rebellions that followed.

From the past, to the present and concievably for a long time to come, it ahs been made clear to the South African minority regime and the rest of the world that the oppressed and degraded Black South African population will struggle and fight for freedom until they have won.

HUMAN RIGHTS DEMONSTRATION

by Vukani Magubane

Over 200 demonstrators gathered at the Amherst Town Commons to show their support for three black women facing charges of disorderly con duct stemming from an incident at Russell's liquor store in Amherst September 29.

The women, Sheila Johnson a librarian at Amherst College, Ada Griffin, a student at Amherst College and Gina Stevens a student at Hamphshire Col lege are scheduled to go on trial November 21 before a North Hampton Court District Judge.

The case, which has gained widespread support from various progressive groups across the valley, has become a rallying point against racisim and violent acts against Third World People in the area

Sheila Johnson, who moved to the area three months ago from New York said 'What a fine in troduction to life in New England. A simple demand for respect by an Afro-American women has become a serious problem.'

'The whole incident would not have happened to a white individual.' she said.

The clerk at Russell's liqour store, the Amherst Police Department and the United States are the ones guilty of disorderly conduct.'

According to Johnson, the reports in the paper by William Russell, owner of the package store are inaccurate.

'They should get their lies together by November. They have messed with the wrong sisters' she said.

Lloyd Hogan, an Economic's professor at Hampshire College said 'The case reads like the same old story. It goes back into the beginning of history with Third World people suffering racial oppression and physical violence.'

'The oppression of these three women is one in a series of events that have happened in the valley since I've been here especially towards third world women. It's nothing new he said, 'We must go away from here with some concrete action and support for these three women.'

Lisa Gaughran, a member of the Political prisioner's support committee said 'There is no middle ground in this case concerning the systematic and genocidal at tack on Third World people.'

'This kind of incident encourages an at mosphere of fear and distrust' she said.

CONFRONTING RACE VIOLENCE

(This is the first of a two-part article by the Committee Against Repression)

Imagine the following scene.

You're in the liquor store with two friends. The guy behind the counter looks you over and decides there's something wrong with your ID. There's an exchange of words, you request to see the manager. Tempers flare. One of your friends tries to leave the store with the sixpack you ordered. The next thing you know is that the three of you have been locked in the store, and the cops have been called. Finally the police arrive. The atmosphere is tense. A cop grabs the arm of one of your friends, twists it, throws her to the floor and handcuffs her. All three of you are then dragged and shoved to the police station, where your right to make a telephone call is postponed for almost two hours.

In the end the police acknowledge that your ID is valid, that you, as well as your companions,are all of age. But this still doesn't put an end to the problem. You're charged with disturbing the peace. A hearing is set. You'll have to go to court.

That's one scene. Now imagine another.

You're a Puerto Rican woman and you're drinking at a bar with a friend. As the night goes on, at a certain point some confusion arises about whether or not you've paid for one or two of your drinks. The bartender gets angry. Harsh words are spoken. Then the bartender or maybe it's the manager-starts slapping you around. They want to show you who's boss. They want to give you a lesson about keeping your mouth shut and staying "in your place".

Neither of these two incidents is hypothetical. They both happened locally during the last month. In both instances, the targeted people were women of color. What's significant about such incidents is that they're symptomatic of a national trend: racist violence of different kinds is on the increase. What happens here in the Valley isn't isolated. It's connected to what's going on in other parts of the country as well.

For instance:

In Boston a black football player is wounded by sniperfire during halftime at a high school football game. He's almost killed, but luckily he survives. Nonetheless the incident rekindles racial problems in Boston's public schools. Stone-throwing, stabbings, verbal abuse-all become part of a typical day. Blacks and other people of color are targeted. Newspapers and politicians proclaim in their evasive not-very-emotional way that they're "addened by the situation". Meanwhile late one evening seven hundred angry whites gather outside the State House screaming racist remarks and claiming that they're tired of being blamed for Boston's problems.

Or again:

On Fulton St. in Brooklyn,New York, a car stops. A group of white men pile out. They harrass two black women, beating one of them up. Then get back into the car, drive off, and disappear.

Racism isn't an abstraction.It's not simply an odd sociological phenomenon that it's interesting to talk about, in a dispassionate way, in a seminar or over dinner. Racism is concrete and immediate: It exists in the streets, in the work place, in the back alley and local bar. It's something that has to be confronted head-on.

Read the following factual story. We think it's significant for a number of different reasons. It begins to suggest the complicated way in which repression occurs in our society and the kind of analysis that's needed to comprehend such repression.

Two years ago in Nebraska, in front of a local store a white man started an argument with Bob Yellowbird and two of his companions (all three were native Americans). At some point in the argument, the white man sprayed the Native Americans with mace. In response to this, they called the police for protection. When the police arrived, however, they refused to arrest the man for assault and battery. The Native Americans insisted that it was the cops' obiligation, as agents of the law, to put the man under arrest for unwarrented assault. The tenacity of Bob Yellowbird and his companions got the police irked. Pretty soon the police initiated a brawl and started beating the Native Americans with their billyclubs. It was at this point that Jo Ann Yellowbird, Bob Yellowbird's wife, arrived, in order to meet her husband as previously arranged. When she got there, she saw a cop sitting on top of Bob on the ground. She begged them to stop fighting, but rather than listen, the cop started to choke her husband. At this moment her instincts took over and she tried to pull the cop off. This was a risky mobe, as she soon found out. The cop leapt up and threw Jo Ann on the ground and kicked her in the stomach. She was eleven months pregnant and she immediately started to hemorrhage. Whole bleeding on the sidewalk, she pleaded to be taken to the hospital. But the police refused. Instead they took her and her husband to the local lock-up. While in jail, both Jo Ann and Bob Yellowbird continued to demand that she be taken to the hospital as soon as possible since she was still hemorrhaging. But no one listened. A number of hours later, the police finally arranged for somebody to give Jo Ann a checkup.It was decided that, yes, she should be taken to a hospital. But rather than take her to a nearby local hospital, they decided she had to be taken to a Native hospital, more than two hours away. When she finally, after much delay, got there, it was too late: she aborted a dead fetus. The coroner's report indicated that the fetus's death was the result of Jo Ann's being kicked in the stomach by the cop. Finally Bob and Jo Ann Yellowbird were let loose on bail, free until their trial for disorderly conduct. The police were charged with nothing.

We feel that what happened to the Yellowbirds is a good example of how frequently more than one kind of oppression is present in the same incident. Jo Ann Yellowbird was caught in a stituation tense with racial hatred, and it was racism that precipitated police violence. But the form of that violence was sexist-kicking a pregnant woman in the stomach and then refusing to take her to the hospital (until too late) is a dramatic example of male disdain for women. No women, regardless of color, can hear Jo Ann Yellowbird's story without feeling slightly sick.

Our point here is this: often there are no absolute dividing lines between the different kinds of oppression. As in Jo Ann Yellowbird's case, racism may be the primary precipitating factor, but there are also unignorable elements of sexism. We can even, however, go further than this. The fact is that statistically most Third World people and women who experience outright repression-oppression come from the working sectors of society. In other words, class is also a major factor in many cases of racist and or sexist violence. In some cases, class may be the primary precipitating factor; in others it may be secondary and less noticeable, but still there.

Once all this is understood, it becomes clear that it's impossible to organize against repression without having a perspective concerning the interconnectedness of different kinds of oppression. Even in a committee like ours, which focuses specifically on incidents of racist violence and repression, such a vision of overlapping nature of the differnt kinds of oppression is necessary. Without such a vision, our analysis would often be too shallow and mechanical. And this shallowness, this absence of sensitivity to the full complexity of a situation, would be a dangerous obstacle in the way of reaching out to different sectors of the community-women, workers, etc.

We say all this because present conditions, both locally and nationally, indicate a serious increase in racist violence. As a committee we're committed to organizing against such violence. On the other hand, we're also committed to not artificially isolating racism, in our analysis or work, from, class and sexual oppression. Even when organizing specifically against racism it's necessary to move forward with a clear vision of the different kinds of oppression that the capitalist system relies on to keep people of color, workers and women reduced to powerlessness. Without such a perspective, we're seriously limited in 1. our ability to analyze society correctly, and 2. our ability to talk to and mobilize people.

At the beginning of this article, we mentioned two recent local examples of racism. One entailed the harrassment of three black women in Russell's Liquor Store and the other entailed a Puerto Rican woman getting beat up in an area bar. Some people might feel that such incidents are relatively low-key, that they aren't sufficiently dramatic to command our attention, that they don't really warrent any kind of major response. We disagree. Such incidents are examples of the kind of day-to-day racist humiliation people of color are forced to endure. Just because these local incidents don't have the dramatic flavor of a Darryl Williams (the Boston football player) being shot at by a sniper doesn't mean that such incidents aren't important. All racist incidents are important without exception, and they must be challanged, publicized and fought against.

First of a three part series on Ancient African Civilization.

Two centuries of scholarly debate have failed to effect historical interpretation of the accomplishments of African people to world civilization. Africa's most prized civilizations in the Nile, Niger, and Zimbabwe, were identified as accomplishments of Caucasoid immigrants or explorers. The Nile Valley civilizations were attributed to "Caucasoid" populations subsequently overrun by "Negroid" elements (Coon 1963, 649).

In Zimbabwe the Great Enclosures were accounted for in the "Poenician School" idea of Europeans exploration to Southern Africa in search of King Solomon's mines (Davidson, 1970 pr. 56). Although some of these ideas have been successfully eliminated one of them has been rigidly adhered to despite evidence to the contrary that civilization is Ancient Egypt.

Art News, December 1978 issue coined the recent interest in Egypt as "Egyptomania." The furor for ancient appreciation was stimulated by the recent American tour of the tomb treasure of Pharoah Tutankhamon between 1976 and 1979. The beautifully precatalogue describing the history and artifacts was published by the Metropolitan Museum in New York

An equally impressive exhibit was discussed in Art News, in the same issue, on the "Arts of Ancient Nubia and the Sudan." It was shown in the Brooklyn Museum between September 30 December 31, 1978. The exhibit was presented because Bernard Bothmer, the director of the Egyptian Department, noticed a surprising number of comments on the 1973 Akenaton and Nefertiti" exhibit there.

The Black people who viewed it commented on Ahkenaton's phisometry, depicted by the museum as deformed and grotesque, and complained that the museum was trying to hide the fact that he was black. Bothmer decided that there was "A desire on the part of black people to identify with an ancient black culture of a higher order."

The problem with both these exhibits is best illustrated by the forward to the Brooklyn's Nubia catalogue by the Museum's Director Michail Bowinick. He stated that: "the cradle of this culture lies at the very confluence of the Blue and White Niles Neither Egyptian nor African, yet often both, this vigorous culture established itself in a harsh and unyielding environment."

This statement defines the insistence by museums across the globe that,1 . Egypt be disassociated from Africa, and,2. it exhibits an ambivalence about placing Nubia with other African Achievements. The Brooklyn Museum's official catalogue "Africa in Antiquity: failed to define Nubia as a black culture. The catalogue employed several noted authorities to author the various chapters describing the exhibit.

The second chapter entitled "Nubian, Negro, Black, Nilotic" by Bruce Trigger, Professor of Anthropology at McGill University in Montreal and its Department Chairman, also authored "Nubia, Under the Pharoahs.:: It appeared, especially after the Art News interview, that the article would present the view that Nubia was a black civilization. Instead Trigger concluded that racial classifications can serve no scientific purpose and that the "People of Nubia are an indigenous African POPULATION, WHOSE PHYSICAL CHARACTERISTICS ARE PART OF A CONTINUM OF PHYSICAL VARIATION IN THE Nile Valley. Yet they are by no means homogeneous."

Such a conclusion fails to definitively state that Nubia was a black civilization and adds credence to the view that Nilotic people (i.e. those living in the Nile Valley) were a mongrelized population of Semestic European and African elements.

I am not denying that admixture did not occur among these ancient people, only that it no more changed their racial composition than Charthaginian and Moorish admixture changed Italy.

In the study of Ancient Egypt the problem is the same. The debate over Egypt's racial composition is clearly shown in Robert Collin's "Problems in African History."

The "Africa in Antiquity" catalogue cited this work on numerous occasions, so I feel that it best represents this scholastic controversy. It all centers on Cheikh Anta Diop's work "Nations, Negroes et Culture" (Paris: Presence Africaine, 1955) published in English as "The African Orgin of Civilization" (Lawerence Hill * Co. 1974).

Diop's evidence has been the only work to induce embarassment and response from the lily-white bastions of Egyptology; although other Black scholars have produce similarly solid evident. Diop produces several comparative arguments displaying a continuity of African cultures. He also utilizes a great deal of the Greek and Roman Classical accounts of Herodotus, Strabo, Pliny and Diodorus.

I do not intend to present the views directly expressed in this controversy. I merely want to present my interpretation of the facts that justify classifying Egypt as a black African civilization. I feel the weight in favor of his theory is best achieved in verifying the account he uses of Diodurus of Sicily.

According to Diodorus: "The Ethiopians say the Egyptians are one of their colonies which was brought under Egypt by Osirus. They even pretend that at the beginning of the world that country was only a sea, but that the Nile, carrying bits of soil in its floods from Ethiopia, finally filled it in and made it a part of the continent...They added that it is from them (the Ethiopians) that they (the Egyptians) learned to honor their kings as gods and to bury their dead with such pomp. Sculpture and writing were born in the land of the Ethiopians..." (Histoire Universelle, III, pg. 341, translation by Abbot Terrassom, Paris 1758). Based on this ancient account the following analysis is intended to present a reinterpretation based on the most recent and most quoted authorities.

To assess the validity of the Ethiopians claims it becomes necessary to draw on not only historical accounts but archaelogical, anatomical, economic and geological studies as well. It becomes apparent that

CENTRAL AMERICA AND THE CARIBBEAN: THE NEW VIETNAM OF THE 80's ?

NEWS ANALYSIS

OCTOBER 1979

By Jose Guillermo Trejo.

WASHINGTON

United States President James Carter latest decision to establish a military command center at Key West, Florida, to reinforce "Rapid Deployment Forces" for military intervention in Central America and the Caribbean, and to order the mockery landing of 2,100 Marines at Guantanamo Naval Base at Cuba, have caused a strong chain-reaction in the U.S., Central America and the Caribbean. In fact, such actions and reactions may bring the beginning of a new war decade in the 80's for Latin America, just like the U.S.-Vietnam war of the 70's in Southeast Asia.

PANAMA

OCTOBER 1, PANAMA CITY, PANAMA. As a result of the treaties ratified by the U.S. Senate in 1978, Panama obtained control over the Canal Zone. And according to a report from Time Magazine, Panama is "a country where anti-American voices can still be heard loud and clear". However, the U.S. will keep control of the canal itself until the 21st century, and retains the right to use military force to ensure its security. Nonetheless, they said, some U.S. Congressmen were afraid that panama at Cuba's request, "might eventualy deny U.S. merchants vessels access to the canal".

CUBA

SEPTIEMBRE 30, LA HAVANA, CUBA. President Castro was interviewed by CBS 60 Minutes and was asked about the "Soviet combat brigade" issue. He called such brigade as the "Training Center No. 12", he declared that this issue was just a "comedy" produced by the Carter Administration to boost his sagging-image for his reelection campaign. For 19 years, the existence of the "training center" was well known by many U.S. Presidents and the issue was timed to become public right before the Sixth Summit Meeting of Nonaligned Nations held in Havana in early September. Obviously, he said, "the aim was to discredit the resolutions taken at the Summit Meeting". Here, many resolutions were taken against the rich nations in the world but specially the tiny minority that own and run the U.S. for their own profit.

UNITED STATES

OCTOBER 1, WASHINGTON, D.C. After reviewing "persuasive evidence" of a "Soviet combat brigade" in Cuba, President Carter announces on national television his response to Cuba. He stepped up "gunboat diplomacy" and brought back the "big stick" of Teddy Roosevelt against Socialism in this troubled region. Despite his efforts to make believe the public of a mini-crisis with Cuba, people from this city challenged his credibility. Few days later, a Washingtonian named C. B. Upham wrote a letter to the Editor of the New York Times saying: " President Carter described evidence of the presence of a Soviet combat brigade in Cuba as "persuasive". Persuasive is short of "convincing" and convincing falls short of proof. We have not given the evidence."

NICARAGUA

OCTOBER 3, MANAGUA, NICARAGUA. The "Frente Sandinista de Liberacion Nacional" (FSLN) leaders have taken Carter's response to Cuba as "a concrete threat" to their victorious revolution. According with an editorial from the "Barricada", the FSLN daily newspaper, they also stated that Carter takes as a "pretext" the supposed discovery of the presence of Soviet military advisers in Cuba, but he admits at the same time that their presence was detected almost 20 years ago. "It's clear that this is no more than a pretext". They continued saying that the "most reactive sectors" of the U.S."cannot even conceive of a process of democratization, independence and sovereignty in Latin America. Much less can they understand the revolucionary possibility that that will might be converted into a new dawn for Latin Americans". The FSLN also believes that Carter's words contradicts with the facts between the conciliatory gesture and the threat. And the force of their reaction was well expressed with this words:

"No threat will makes us renounce our independence. In the face of danger we will find strength in unity and revolutionary decisiveness. In the face of Imperialism, we will always be ready for battle. Halt the imperialist aggression. Death to the counterrevolution.

Women soldiers fought during the insurrection. They intend to continue to be responsible for defense of the revolution.

Fidel Castro addressing the United Nations.

Carter's plan to land an assault force of 1,600-1,800 U.S. Marines at Guantánamo Bay in Cuba—an outrageous violation of Cuban sovereignty—is a clear threat to use U.S. military might throughout Central America and the Caribbean.

UNITED STATES

OCTOBER 12, NEW YORK, NEW YORK. United Nations. President Fidel Castro was acclaimed in his speech to the General Assembly where he warned the rich countries that if the world economic order is not changed in favor of the poor majority, "the future will be apocaliptic". And as reported in NUMMO NEWS, Fidel expressed to the Assembly that the Nonaligned Nations have "reiterated their solidarity with the struggle of the Puerto Rican people and their inalienable right for self-determination, independence and territorial integrity". He also asked for a new international monetary system and called "excesive" the amounts spent in arms around the world. He also said that 300 Billion Dollars were needed during the next ten years to aliviate the poor countries from hunger and finance their development, and that this money should come from the rich developed countries which spend this amount in arms in one year only.

OCT 15
EL SALVADOR

OCTOBER 15, SAN SALVADOR, EL SALVADOR. The New York Times reported that a coup had taken place in this country where many political movements have been causing unrest and acts of terrorism against the government. A five-men junta has overthrown the repressive regime of President Carlos Humberto Romero. After 47 years of military rule in El Salvador, they are still trying to make believe the public that their act is not another comedy produced by the Carter Ad ministration. The "Fuerzas Populares de Liberacion" charged Washington of giving instructions to the junta. In addition, the country's powerful peasant-worker-student coalitions, made up of the Popular Revolu tionary Block, the February 28 Popular Leagues, and the United Popular Action Front, have all denounced the coup as a maneuver to deceive the people and weaken the popular movements. The U.S. involvement in this event was crystal clear, the State Department was reportedly saying in Times Magazine: "It's the best piece of news we've had in this office for a long time". Two weeks before the conspirators informed the U.S. embassy in El Salvador that they were ready to stage Romero's overthrow. And through an American diplomat, they gave Romero an ultimatum: "He had un til 3.00 p.m. to get out of the country", according to this magazine. The President's brother Jose Javier was assasinated five weeks ago.

PUERTO RICO

OCTOBER 18, SAN JUAN, PUERTO RICO. The "Fuerzas Armadas de Liberacion Nacional" and other three revolutionary organizations, claimed responsibility for four bombs that exploted at widely scattered monuments and govenment buildings on the island, doing little property damage and causing no injuries, reported the New York Times. The FALN , uetter known as "Los Macheteros", the Armed Forces for Popular Resistance and the Organization of Volunteers for the Puerto Rican Revolution, also have taken responsibility for setting the bombs that exploted in downtown Chicago and at the Great Lake Naval Training Center. A communique dispatched to several newspapers said that more than a dozen bombs had been placed and also linked the bombings with the trials of 21 persons accused of attemting to impede Navy maneuvers on the island o Vieques.

Obviously, the release of the four Puerto Rican nationalists last month and the declarations from the Third World nations in the United Nations in favor of the Puerto Rican independence movement, have generated a new momentum to their struggle against the U.S.

JAMAICA

KINGSTON, JAMAICA. Socialist Prime Minister Michael Manly has pursued closer ties with Havana, where Fidel's government has stationed 450 Cuban advisers on the island; most are Cuban experts in agriculture, construction, education and public health. But Cuba's Ambassador to Jamaica, Ulises Estrada Lescalles, according with reports in Time Magazine, "has been identified by Western intelligence sources as an agent of the D.G.I., Cuba's counterpart of the CIA.

ST LUCIA

ST LUCIA, WINDWARD ISLAND. The newly in dependent country whose leftist Primer Allan Louisy and his tough Marxist deputy George Oblum have declared in Time Magazine that "the Caribbean is going through a period of searching for its own structures and systems. Traditionally we had the Western systems and structures. Now we are looking at them and see how they are related with our own circumstances". They host a dozen of Cuban advisers.

GRENEDA

GRENEDA, GRENEDA ISLAND. Prime Minister Sir Eric Gairy was ousted last March by a left wing coup, and was replaced by a Socialist regime that established relations with Havana and the American government worries that they could set an example for other British island colonies in easter Caribbean.

OCT 22
GUYANA

JONESTOWN, GUYANA. Socialist Prime Minister Forbes Burnham is being pushed more to the left by radical opposition groups. The site of last November Jonestown's horrors host 65 Cuban advisers.

U.S. NEW WAR

In summary, all over Central America and the Caribbean, an anti-imperialist fever is sweeping in almost every country. Cuban advisers are stationed all over the area and many popular movements for liberation are active in their struggle to overthrow their government to establish a Socialist society like Nicaragua. The United States cannot longer consider the Caribbean as as "American Lake" for their military exercises and gun boat diplomacy. Cuban involvement in this region mean that Castro's attempts to export his revolution and ideas have been successful, and they play a key roll in this trouble waters.

In the past, from the "Manifest Destinity" in the early 1800's to the "Monroe Doctrine" in the beginning of this century, the U.S. has always developed phylisophies that justifies war drives against their neighbor nations in Latin America in the name of "free enterprise and liberty". Since then, the U.S. government has aborted revolutions, overthrown governments, sent in troops into countries like Nicaragua, Haiti and the Domonican Republic among many others. But today, the picture of a new Vietnam war in Latin America is becoming clearer as the U.S. increases their inflation, goes deeper into recession, brings more unemployment and dives into more dollar-devaluations. Hence, this economic factors are the symtoms for a new war that have created this comedy-crisis with Cuba.

Therefore, the U.S. Government badly needs a new Vietnam to deffusse their inflated capitalist economy, otherwise the dollar will colapse against other currencies in the world. The revival of "mucho macho Marine men " policies merly marks the beginning of their new military warfare against Latin America in the 80's.

NUCLEAR SOUTH AFRICA

Editor's note. With the U S reporting that South Africa might have exploded a nuclear device. It has been no secret that the South Africans have had this capability as explained below.

By John Lamperti

On August 6, 1977, the Soviet Embassy in Washington informed the White House that South Africa was preparing to off an atomic explosion at a test site in the Kalahari desert. The same warning was sent to France, Great Britain and West Germany, and made public by the Soviet Press Agency TASS on August 8. The source of the information was not given, but it is known that Soviet surveillance satellites had been watching the area. U. S. satellites had also observed the Kalahari site, and had even been maneuvered for a closer look, both before and after the U.S. received the Soviet warning.

Analysis of the evidence by U.S. officials convinced the Administration that the threat was genuine. In the next few days, each of the Western governments made official inquiries of the South Africans as to their intentions. The United States privately demamded assurance that there would be no test, and reportedly threatened strong counteractions if its warning was unheeded. "We were pretty severe in private," said one U.S.SOURCE. On August 21 President Carter learned that the South Africans had agreed, and two days later Carter announced that "South Africa has informed us that they do not intend to develop nuclear explosive devices for any purpose..."

To understand what this development means, we must look at the level of nuclear technology in South Africa today, and at how things have reached their present state.

What nuclear facilities does South Africa have?

South Africa has, or soon will have, the full range of facilities needed to produce fuel for nuclear power plants or explosive material for atomic weapons. It is the only nuclear-capable nation in Southern Africa, and it is by far the strongest military power in the region. Nuclear assistance from the United States has been of critical importance.

South Africa's first nuclear reactor, SAFARI 1, went into operation in 1965 at the National Nuclear Research Center at Pelindaba, near Pretoria. SAFARI 1 is a large research reactor fueled with highly enriched uranium, and it has provided an essential training ground for South African technicians. Another research reactor or "critical assembly" was built soon after 1965 by the South African Atomic Energy Board and is also located at Pelindaba.

South Africa controls very large reserves of uranium, and has developed a sophisticated mining and refining industry. Including the huge mine at Rossing in the occupied territory of Namibia, South Africa has command over the third largest uranium reserves outside the Communist bloc, after the United States and Canada. In addition, South Africa can perform much of the processing necessary to turn uranium ore into fuel for nuclear reactors, or into material for weapons. It possesses an operating uranium enrichment plant, the only one outside of the U.S., the U.S.S.R., Western Europe and China. Although the present plant is called a "pilot" project and its output is limited (and secret), work is underway to expand its capacity greatly. Still more ambitious plans for a large, commercial-scale enrichment facility apparently have been postponed due to a lack of foreign financial support.

Finally, two large nuclear power reactors are under construction at Koeberg, near Cape Town. These reactors, scheduled for completion in1982 and 1983, will produce over 920 megawatts of electricity each. They are being built by a consortium of French companies headed by the Fromatome Company. The low-enriched uranium fuel for the Koeberg reactors initially is to be supplied by the United States, but South African officials claim that the country's own enrichment plant at Valindaba will be able to supply all of Koeberg's needs when the expansion now under way is completed.

If those claims are true, the South African regime soon will be able to turn its nuclear facilities to any purpose it chooses.

Could South Africa make nuclear weapons?

Yes, it could--and many observers think it has already done so. The two essentials for any potential bomb-maker are a supply of weaponsgrade fissionable material, and the presence of scientists, engineers and technicians with knowledge and experience of nuclear technology. South Africa today has both of these.

A long history of cooperation with the United States and Europe has provided South Africa with a pool of highly trained nuclear physicists and engineers. The SAFARI I reactor, the main training facility for South African technicians, was built by the U.S. firm Allis Chalmers under President Eisenhower's "Atoms for Peace" program. The uranium mining industry and related facilities jointly engineered by U.S., British and South African personnel have also provided many training opportunities. Hundreds of South African scientists and engineers have studied in the United States, and nuclear experts from the U.S., Germany and other Western countries have worked and taught in South Africa. As Dr. A.J.A. Roux, President of the AEB, himself has admitted, South Africa its "degree of advancement today in large measure to the training and assistance so willingly provided by the United States of America during the early years of our nuclear program..."

Weapons-grade nuclear material is also available to the apartheid regime. The Valindaba uranium enrichment plant is presumably capable of producing modest quantities of bomb-grade material; in this way Pretoria could obtain atomic bombs of the type which destroyed Hiroshima. It is also possible that South Africa has access to plutonium, which could be obtained clandestinely from abroad or from small secret facilities within South Africa itself; however, this is speculation. Not in doubt is the fact that if and when South Africa obtains a large-scale enrichment plant or an operating nuclear power station its potential access to bomb-grade uranium or plutonium will be vastly increased.

The requirements for producing nuclear weapons are present in South Africa, if its government chooses to follow that policy. And if the weapons are made, they can be delivered to their targets -- provided the targets are not very distant or too well defended. According to most assesments of how South Africa might use atomic weapons, these conditions are met.

The South African Air Force has a number of British, French and Italianmade aircraft which could carry nuclear bombs. A fission bomb of about 20 kilotons yield, made by a nuclear power without extensive weapons design and testing experience, might weigh around one ton. The British built Buccaneer and Canberra light bombers in the South African Air Force can carry up to 4 tons of bombs, and the Air Force's French Mirage F-1 aircraft have maximum bomb loads even greater. In addition to bombers, many transport planes or civilian airliners could be converted into long-range bombers capable of delivering crude atomic bombs to poorly-defended targets.

South Africa's armed forces also have some missile capability. With help from France, Germany, and Israel, effective antiaircraft and antiship missiles have been acquired. These weapons would not play a direct part in nuclear warfare. But Israel has also supplied the Jericho missile, which is described as "nuclear capable." In addition, South Africa has sophisticated radar and other electronic equipment necessary for the effective use of these weapons, and development and testingof rockets and missiles is continuing at several sites and ranges.

Obviously, all of this does not mean that South Africa can compete with the intercontinental missile systems and long-range bombers of the superpowers. But if their potential victims are lightly defended cities or camps in nearby African nations, or are within South Africa itself, the Air Force could deliver nuclear weapons to their targets.

Has South Africa's nuclear program had much outside help?

Indeed it has: from the United States, England, France, West Germany, and even from Israel. Foreign investments, expertise and assistance have been essential to South Africa's nuclear development.

Soon after the end of World War II, the U.S. and British governments sought new sources of uranium for their nuclear weapons development,and they found them in South Africa. working with the South African Atomic Energy board (established in 1949) and South African mining companies, the U.S. and the U.K. provided technological help, equipment and capital for extracting uranium oxide from the same ore which yields much of South Africa's gold. (Both gold and uranium are exclusively government-owned in South Africa, but private companies run the mines under leasing arrangements.) Since the gold mines were already operating and employed many very low-paid black workers, the production of this uranium was relatively inexpensive.

Development of the Rossing uranium mine in Namibia, one of the world's largest, could eventually double South Africa's production of the ore. Mining operations began at Rossing in 1976, under the management of Rio 1into Zinc, a far-tung international mining corporation with headquarters in Great Britain. A number of other corporations, including Union Carbide and Utah Mining, have done extensive prospecting in nearby areas of Namibia. U.S. Steel Corporation and Newmont Mining are also involved in the uranium rush.

The United States first signed an Agreement for Cooperation in the nuclear field with South Africa in 1957; this agreement has been amended and extended to the year 2004. It provides for technical information exchanges, sale of equipment and the supply of "special nuclear material," such as enriched uranium. In addition to supplying the research reactor SAFARI 1 and its highly enriched uranium fuel, the U.S. provided 6 tons of heavy water and 2)3 ton of lightly (2 percent) enriched uranium for the "critical assembly" Pelindunа-Zero at the Pelindaba nuclear research center.

Finally, as mentioned, the large nuclear power station at Koeberg is being built by a consortium of French companies led by Framatome. Originally there were five bidders for this contract. Westinghouse Corporation was quickly eliminated from consideration, but a consortium led by General Electric Company was a finalist and expected to receive the contract until a last-minute switch by the South African authorities. Framatome, however, is partly owned by Westinghouse and uses its technology under license, so U.S. companies are still involved. Coal and hydroelectric power are abundant and cheap in South Africa, and it is far from clear that nuclear-generated electricity is needed, or that the Koeberg plant can be justified on economic or commercial grounds. Its spent fuel, however, will provide the possibility of recovering substantial quantities of plutonium which would greatly increase the number weapons South Africa could build and reduce their cost. The deal with France also helps maintain good relations with South Africa's major weapons supplier and a future uranium customer.

Other U.S. companies which have participated in South Africa's nuclear development include U.S. Nuclear, Gulf Oil, Texas Nuclear, Gulf General Atomic, Edlow International, Beckman Instruments, Kerr-mcKee and many more.

Zimbabwe-Rhodesia

by William Borders, London

In a detailed analysis, the Patriotic Front said that the British poan would not bring peace to Zimbabwe Rhodesia, that the interim government invisioned in it would not be imparticial, and that the new elections is called for could not be "free and fair," as the British promised. The Front demanded a greater role for itself in the transition, and the supervision by United Nations teams of both the elections and a cease-fire.

But although they criticized the Bristish plan, they stopped short of rejecting it outright, indicating that, for the moment at least, the three-party converence that has been underway for seven weeks would continue.

"We are here to negotiate," said Willie Musuruwa, a spokesman for Joshua Nkomo, co-leader of the front. "We have come here because we feel a responsibility to bring peace to country."

Bishop Muzorewa is believed close to accepting it, even though it could require him to step down as Prime Minister during the transition, and content the new election without the advantage of incumbency

WESTERN DOMINANCE DISRUPTS TRADITIONAL ASIAN CULTURE

by Tui Li and Cassandra Pan
Mount Holyoke College '81

For Asians, culture and heritage are their treasure. In the past, they had advocated loyalty, filial piety and charity as the basic standards for both individuals and society alike. Obedience and respect, in particular, have always been rigorously demanded by those in positions of authority and are considered the basis for success. Unlike Asians, Westerners have valued individualism as the key to success. Their differences in fundamental ideas have caused a culture conflict between Western and Eastern societies and as a result, Asian nations do not readily comply with Western methods of modernization. To Asians, modernization means cultural disintegration since western capitalism overloads the importance of a society's culture.

For example, by "helping" to develop Asian countries, Western Europe and the United States (the primary countries responsible) hinder the preservation of a traditional Asian family structure because they impel their imperialistic system on those Asian countries. During the 1960's when the U.S. began to build factories for her economic benefit in Taiwan, Taiwanese social institutions became altered in structure. Her traditional family structure disintegrated with the growth of modernization. For instance, many youths left home to work in the factories and gradually drifted away from the closely-knit families. Since the United States did not understand the significance of a traditional Taiwanese family structure, she did not recognize the importance of it.

Understanding the social and cultural differences of a society is necessary because the Western powers are handicapped with their lack of knowledge of traditional Asian ideology. In countries such as China and India, nature is a significant factor in determining an individuals fate. The less man disturbs nature, the more fortunate and happy he would be. For instance, Chinese and Indians believe that their homes are protected by ancestral spirits. These spirits protected all that nature provided people (e.g. trees) and all that was created by man as long as it did not disturb nature. The Chinese and Indian concept of nature is the basis of their social structure. Western financed modernization in rural areas of Asian countries upsets those people because it conflicts with their customs. As a result, they resent the foreigners for cultivating their land in a way that disturbs nature and inevitably disrupts their social structures. It is easy for an authority to give orders, but the authority must realize the influence of traditional thinking.

This Western dominance and arrogant superiority is best exemplified by Japan's literal "forced" opening in the 19th century. However, Japan quickly imitated the ways of the West - even its imperialism. Today, one can see how strong Western influences are, to the loss of traditional Japanese customs, especially among the youth. They tend to believe that anything Western is great and kids in Japan copy Western dress and sports (like football). Fading away are customs such as the wearing of traditional kimonos and the learning of "bushido", the way of the warrior i.e., the art and practice of such sports as archery and kendo.

This East-West relationship seems to be one-sided: the dominant is always correct and the weak must conform to their ideas. However, in order for the West to gain respect from Asian countries, the former must first learn to understand the cultural differences and then to accept them. Under a pressurized condition, mutual communication is impossible since those under pressure are being deprived of self-assertion. Because of the constant pressure to be submissive, there is no equality. Where there is no balanced relation, there arises misunderstanding among the people of those societies.

Western disregard of Asian culture and tradition is commonly depicted by their misconceptions of Asian students from the elementary level right through college. Most Asian students from a strict, traditional environment tend to sit quietly in class, and eventually become disregarded. From antiquity to the present day, Asians were subject to long term self-restraint and were encouraged to be reserved. Asians' behavior in a classroom situation is due to the effect that the traditional idea of respecting authority has had on them. Many people misunderstand the Asian passivity as a lack of self-expression and self-motivation.

Asian students refuse to express their ideas or discuss Asian culture under authoritian situations. Therefore, anyone who is sincerely interested in Asian culture mist take the initiative to inquire of it for himself.

PARK CHUNG HEE ASSASSINATED

The End of a Dictatorship in South Korea?
by Richard Mei, Jr.

Early last Friday evening, President Park Chung Hee was killed during a dinner within the compounds of the Korean C.I.A., near the Presidential Palace in Seoul. According to official accounts, Park was shot twice by Kim Jae Kyu, the head of the K.C.I.A., and a life long friend. An argument with Mr Parks chief bodyguard occured, followed by "An emotional outburst" in which Mr. Kim killed Park, two bodyguards, and three other persons. It is uncertain whether a seventh victim (another bodyguard), died from his wounds.

Prime Minister Choi Kyu Hah has been named acting President while martial law has been imposed through virtually the entire nation. Meanwhile, America's 38,000 troops stationed in Korea have been placed in a state of alert.

The official account of President Park's death sounds rather dubious but it will take weeks before the actual events and reasons eventually filter out of South Korea. However, there are strong indications that the deaths were part of a well planned assasination plot which may have been supported by the military and possibly even foreign sources.

A Brief History

American involvement in Korea began immediately with the withdrawal of Japanese forces after their surrender in 1945. Korea was essentially divided in half when Soviet troops occupied the Northern section while American troops moved into the South. The Russians then established Kim Il Sung as leader in the North, while the Americans, ignorant of Korea's history and culture, let alone contemporary politics, struggled to establish a favorable government in the South.

After the Korean War, South Korea became vital to America's security interests in East Asia and U.S. troops have remained ever since.

Within a couple of years after Park's military coup in 1961, American economic and military aid (in the hundreds of millions of dollars) continued. Rapid economic development began, especially after foreign investments in Korea skyrocketed. Although many Koreans credit Park with the tremendous economic boom that has occured during his rule (an annual economic growth rate of over 10 percent a year), they resent his violent means to repress opposition in the name of national security and to protect the nation from the Communist threat in the North. It was in the last ten years or so, of his 18 year rule that Park became increasingly brutal, arresting his opponents and changing the Constitution twice in order that he could remain in power. However, too rapid growth has led to serious consequences. In addition, inflation has soared towards 30 percent this year.

Recent Events

The expulsion of oppositional leader Kim Young Sam from the National Assembly on October 9 led to the resignations of the entire 69 member parliamentary opposition and touched off demonstrations in the cities of Pusan, Masan and Changwon in recent weeks. Political discontent along with economic and social grievances seem to have finally combined to place increased pressure on the government. Park's response to the demonstrations though, only became increasingly violent, with an estimated 1,500 people arrested. Yet, in the past, Park was able to crush all uprisings with strong support from the military. This time though, did he begin to lose that support ?

The possiblities for an American connection to Park's death are very strong. Policy conflicts and tensions have increased between the U.S. and South Korea after Carters' elections. A major policy difference was with Carters' proposed withdrawal of all American troops stationed in South Korea. Another breaking point was when the U.S. normalized relations with the Peoples' Republic of China at the end of last year. The Carter administration had always been critical of Park's violation's of human rights but especially so after the recent repression against political opponents.

Not only did Park have conflicts outside but also inside. The K.C.I.A. and its chief Mr. Kim had tried to urge Park towards a more moderate stance against political opponents and dissidents. Not only did the K.C.I.A. feel that Park was endangering stable government but so did the Army, which was the base of Park's support. Over the years, the K.C.I.A. and the Army have been the only two institutions in Korean political life with any real power.

In any case, it is extremely questionable whether Mr. Kim acting alone, shot and killed six men. The possibilities for a well planned plot to assasinate Park and the support from outside sources are very strong.

In conclusion, it can only he hoped that with the death of the dictator Park, there will be greater democracy and freedom far the peoples of South Korea.

Film Review: The Opium war

by Danny Fong
Amherst College

Billed as "the first feature film to come out of the Peoples' Republic of China," Lin Tse Hsu (The Opium War) was shown last week, sponsored by the Amherst Asian Students Association. Not only did the film give a view of the Opium War from "The other side" but it also gave an interesting peek at present Chinese thinking.

The film is a view of the war totally different from that which we are accustomed to from our textbooks. In the movie, China is a country whose people are so weakened and corrupted by opium that they become enslaved to the drug. Ultimately, China is in the hands of the Biritish opium traders. The emperor of China, realizing the dangerous weakening of the country, assingns an official , Lin Tse— Hsu, to stop the flow of opium coming in at Canton, then the only portopen to the British. Lin Tse—Hsu is at first succesful but is later stripped of all of his powers. The British, who are portrayed as typical villains, i.e. snobbish, deceitful and conniving, had been waiting for an excuse to invade and exploit China. Lin Tse Hsu's seizure of the opium (which was still officially British property) provided the opportunity. After having bribed some incredibly corrupt Chinese officials (not including Lin) the Chinese were forced to pay indemnities and to disarm themselves. Thus, in the sneakiest manner, the British then attacked China. All seems bleak but finally, the peasants rally and drive the foreign barbarians out.

Naturally, the movie is propagandistic through its emphasis of Maoist ideology. The wretched peasants seem to be content with their siple lives, yet they act as prime movers of society. They provide the back bone and the muscle. In addition, theycome in close contact with the leaders and help by offering suggestions. Another idea repeatedly emphasized through the movie is the equal role of men and women in society. They both do the same work and share the same glory.

This espousal of Communism may seem unsettling to many, but the cheering of the audience when the British ships were blown up and the jeering at the British "Bad guys" indicates that perhaps we are coming out of our narrow perspectives and coming to understand that othe often see events in different lights.

THE $3,258 QUESTION:

How will you pay for college this year?

DOONESBURY © 1973 G.B. TRUDEAU/DISTR. BY UNIVERSAL PRESS SYNDICATE. REPRINTED WITH PERMISSION.

—TEGWYN LEATH
Junior Pharmacy Major
Tennessee Tech University

"They don't tell you much about paying for college when you're in high school. I've had to learn on my own how to get the help I need. And I'm still confused!"

Like hay fever, midterms, and TV reruns, it arrives every spring—the "ouch" letter. Tuition, it reads, will be going up $200, $300, or more next year.

Ouch.

And tuition's not the only college expense that smarts. Because of rising fuel, food, and labor costs, room-and-board charges are swelling too. In fact, the price of almost every college essential, from pencils to pizza, is getting painful. And at $3.50 to $5 a ticket, you can't even escape at the movies. For one year at a four-year college, you now pay an average of $3,258 at a public school and $5,526 at a private school—9 percent more than last year. And next year it will probably be more.

But then you already know college is expensive. That's not what we're here to tell you. But did you know:

- That there's over $12 billion in scholarship, grant, loan, and work-study money out there?
- That the federal government has just made it easier for you to get a chunk of the more than $4 billion in grant and loan money it offers?
- That more and more schools are offering scholarships based on grades, not on financial need?
- That about 40 percent of the college students in America make part-time jobs pay off in both cash and experience?
- That you may be able to earn three to six college credits this year simply by taking one $20 exam?
- That going to graduate school requires extra financial planning that should start right now?
- That you can ease your way through the forms, jargon, and red tape surrounding the financial aid process merely by understanding how your financial aid office works?

That's what we're all about—helping you find these and other ways to ease the sting of that yearly "ouch" letter. Whether you want a few dollars for the weekend or need help just to stay in school, a little knowledge, effort, and imagination can take some of the pain out of paying for your education.

Those Were The Days

No wonder the '50s were carefree. According to statistics compiled by the University of Oklahoma's The Oklahoma Daily, in 1959:

- A three-room furnished apartment rented for $60 per month.
- Sirloin steak sold for 89 cents a pound.
- A Renault automobile cost $1,784.

And to top it off, tuition and room and board at a four-year private college cost an average of $1,437 a year.

Top Billing: 10 Of the Country's Costliest Colleges

College costs rose an average of 9 percent this year. Below are charges for tuition, fees, and room and board at 10 of the costliest colleges in the country. According to the College Board, a typical student spends an additional $230 on books and supplies, $250 to $450 on transportation, and $500 on personal expenses.

What Should You Expect To Pay for College?

Even if you feel you may not be eligible for help in paying for college, you could benefit by evaluating your financial situation to make sure you have the resources you need.

First, figure your annual college expenses. Aside from the obvious costs of tuition, room and board, and required fees, you should add in estimates of the money you'll spend on books, transportation, and personal expenses.

Next, determine how much your family can afford to contribute. This will depend on your parents' income and assets (things like real estate, savings, and stocks and bonds) and on the number of children they have to support. According to the College Scholarship Service, which administers a standard need-analysis test to applicants for financial aid, a family of four with an income of $16,000 and one child in college is expected to contribute from $810 to $1,650 per year toward the student's educational costs (depending on total family assets). If the same family has two children in college, its expected contribution for each child drops by 40 percent.

But don't think that a high family income automatically disqualifies you for any help. Even a family whose yearly income is $30,000 or more may be considered "needy"—if there are unusually large medical bills, alimony payments, or other out-of-the-ordinary expenses. After deciding on your parents' contribution, calculate what you'll be able to pay. The College Scholarship Service expects students to use 35 percent of their savings each year, as well as money earned at summer jobs and any veteran's or Social Security benefits.

To get a rough idea of your degree of need, add your parents' contribution to the money you can put in, and subtract the total from your overall college costs. If there is a gap, you should probably apply for a Basic Educational Opportunity Grant and other forms of aid.

Even if you've been turned down for aid in the past, changes in your family's economic situation coupled with liberalized formulas for dispensing federal aid may qualify you for some help in the future.

To get a more accurate idea of your eligibility for help in paying for college, use the detailed worksheets in Meeting College Costs, a free booklet published by the College Scholarship Service. The booklet can be obtained from financial aid officers or from College Board Publication Orders, Box 2815, Princeton, N.J. 08541.

Want the lowdown on government sources of funds for college? Write for the free booklet Student Consumer's Guide, available from the Office of Education, Room 1127, 400 Maryland Ave. S.W., Washington, D.C. 20002.

Resolving the Dependent/ Independent Dilemma

If you can prove that you're truly self-supporting, you may get more help in paying for college by declaring financial independence. Status as an independent means that your income and assets—not your family's—are used to determine your eligibility for loans, grants, and scholarships.

Proving independence involves meeting at least three conditions: 1) that you haven't lived with your parents for more than six consecutive weeks in the past year; 2) that you haven't received more than $750 in support from your family during the past year; and 3) that you haven't been listed as a dependent on your parents' income tax return for the past two years.

When you're applying for grants and loans as an independent, be prepared to back your claim with tax returns and other financial documents. Since the government has made an increased amount of aid available to independents, it might be worth your while to start working toward independent status as soon as you can.

Methods of estimating actual college expenses and qualifying for grants, loans, and scholarships are covered in Money for College! How To Get It, a handbook compiled by a university financial aid director. The major federal, state, and private programs are covered, as are aids for minority and disadvantaged students. A special section for married and independent students and a glossary of financial aid terms are particularly useful. Money for College! How To Get It, by Donald R. Moore, Barron's Educational Series, 1979, $2.25.

Fast Breaks for Female Athletes

Women's athletic scholarships are big news on campuses these days.

At more than 580 schools, in sports ranging from basketball at Old Dominion to riflery at Eastern Kentucky University to rodeo at Dawson Community College in Montana, talented female athletes are finding that play means pay. UCLA alone will offer 80 female athletes close to $140,000 in scholarship money this year—five times the amount available four years ago.

Competition is keen for the awards, which range in value from about $700 to full tuition and room and board. Though many women's programs recruit scholarship recipients directly from high school, most schools reserve awards for proven performers—women with one or more years of varsity experience.

Walk-ons—women who decide to compete in a sport after they reach college—can try for scholarships by finding out from the athletic department what money is available in their sport, or by making a team and performing well. For more detailed information on women's scholarship opportunities in college athletics, write for a copy of the Women's Sports Foundation College Scholarship Guide, available from the foundation at 195 Moulton St., San Francisco, Calif. 94123. Include $1 for postage and handling.

Best Bets For the Brightest

In an effort to keep top-quality students and compete with schools charging lower tuitions, an increasing number of colleges are offering attractive grants and scholarships based on criteria other than financial need.

A survey taken in 1977 by the College Board found that 64 percent of schools surveyed gave these "no-need" grants, which averaged $971 per year. Private schools with large endowments are most likely to offer this type of scholarship, with small, church-affiliated schools running a close second.

A booklet entitled The A's & B's of Academic Scholarships lists nearly 600 institutions which provide full and partial tuition scholarships regardless of financial status. You can get a copy by sending $2 to Octameron Associates, Dept. A, P.O. Box 3437, Alexandria, Va. 22302.

Basic Grants: The Uncle Sam Connection

The federal government calls them Basic Educational Opportunity Grants, and that's what they are: basic, the foundation for paying for a college education.

The new Middle Income Student Assistance Act, passed by Congress last fall, makes 2.7 million students eligible for BEOGs this year—about one million more than last year. In general, a student whose family income is $25,000 or less can expect to share in the $1.5 billion allocated for BEOGs, though most financial aid officers say it doesn't hurt to apply even if you are unsure of your eligibility. Awards range from $200 to $1,800, with the average expected to be $916 this year.

There's still time to get a grant covering this school year. You've got until March 15, 1980 to apply!

To get a BEOG:

- You must be an undergraduate enrolled at least half-time.
- You must be a U.S. citizen or permanent resident.
- You must qualify for aid based on a government formula.

The formula uses information about your income and your family's income and assets, as reported on a BEOG application or on one of four other forms. There's no cost to apply.

About six weeks after application, you'll receive a Student Eligibility Report (SER) listing an eligibility index number and a rough estimate of how much your grant will be. Your school computes the actual amount of your award based on the index number and your college expenses. Grants are paid directly by check or are deducted from your tuition bill.

Supplemental Grants

The federal government's Supplemental Educational Opportunity Grants (SEOGs) are intended for students who wouldn't be able to stay in school without them.

Awarded by financial aid offices on the basis of exceptional need, the grants range from $200 to $1,500 a year, with a $4,000 limit over four years. More than 3,000 colleges and universities participate in this program, awarding over $333 million this year directly to students who qualify.

Undergraduates who receive SEOGs must be enrolled at least half-time. Graduate students are not eligible. If your school awards you an SEOG, it must provide additional aid at least equal to the amount of your grant. Contact your financial aid office for application materials and further information.

Down-Home Dollars

When it comes to tracking down a grant or scholarship, you may not have to wander far. Your home state may be your best resource.

This year, states expect to award a total of $912 million to college students, up more than $100 million from a year ago.

Some state programs are set up to help needy students; others reward students who show academic promise. Most require scholarship money to be used within state borders (exceptions include Connecticut, Delaware, Massachusetts, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, and Vermont).

For more information on state scholarship and grant programs that affect you, contact your state scholarship office or your college financial aid office.

Scholarships: To Have and To Hold

Good job! You worked hard for that scholarship or grant. Now comes the real work—keeping it.

If you miss a deadline, forget to reapply, or get lost in the financial aid shuffle, you may face a costly surprise next year. So, here are five questions you should ask when you receive your grant or scholarship:

1. How much am I getting, and for how long?
An award letter from your school or scholarship/grant sponsor should say how much money you'll get this year and how much you can expect in the future. Keep this letter. If any mix-ups occur, you may need a copy. If you don't have an award letter that states explicitly what you can expect, get one from your financial aid office or scholarship/grant sponsor.

2. Do I need to reapply next year?
Some scholarships are renewed automatically; others take just as much work to reapply for as the initial application did. The Basic Educational Opportunity Grant (BEOG) program, for example, requires you to fill out a new application each year. Though your financial aid office can help, you're safest if you know when and how to reapply.

3. Who controls the money?
When things go wrong—and they can—know who makes the decisions and where to go to plead your case. In the future, you may wish to transfer your scholarship or grant, take a year off, or use some of the money for summer school. Developing a personal relationship with the person who controls your money will save time and trouble. Writing your congressman can help resolve hassles with federal aid sources.

4. What do they want from me?
Keeping your money may require maintaining a minimum grade-point average, living on campus, scoring 40 points a game, or writing a thesis. Know what is expected of you and what happens if you fail to meet requirements.

5. What could the future bring?
Some scholarships and grants are based on need. Be aware of how a change in family finances might affect your award. Also, be aware of threats to your scholarship or grant, such as cuts in funding or changes in program requirements. You worked hard for your scholarship or grant; this is no time to lose it.

Scholarships for Sideliners

Although they paint helmets, make travel arrangements, and conduct bed checks instead of scoring touchdowns, members of the Notre Dame Student Managers Organization are eligible for scholarships awarded by the athletic department.

Thirteen seniors, who train three years to manage one of the Fighting Irish varsity programs, receive awards ranging in value from $3,789 to $5,830 (manager of the football team is considered the choicest assignment, carrying a full scholarship). Juniors get a $400 tuition credit, a school letter, and money for books.

All male freshmen are eligible to join the Student Managers Organization, explains Jim O'Brien, athletic department business manager. Women who want to manage one of the school's four women's teams are eligible for scholarship money under a separate program.

"The beauty of the Student Managers Organization is that it's completely run by the students," adds O'Brien.

Plugging Into Scholarship Sources

Who are you? What are you? And how can that information help you find money for college?

Thousands of students have made who and what they are pay by using Scholarship Search, a computerized service that matches undergraduates with sources of scholarship, grant, and loan money. "It's similar to computer dating," explains Mary Ann Maxin, executive director. "We use the computer to bring the student and donor together."

For $45, students fill out a questionnaire and receive a list of up to 25 sources of aid for which they are eligible, worth at least $5,000. The list is based on answers to 39 questions concerning career choice, college major, military service, parents' nationality, and other distinguishing characteristics.

Though Scholarship Search won't guarantee you a grant or scholarship, it claims that nearly half its clients receive help from some of the more than 250,000 sources in its computer. For information and an application, write to Scholarship Search, 1775 Broadway, Suite 627, New York, N.Y. 10019.

Major Aids for Minorities

Several organizations provide scholarships and financial information for minority students. For example:

—The NAACP offers $1,000 scholarships to black college students showing academic promise and leadership ability. Write to the NAACP, 1790 Broadway, New York, N.Y. 10019.

—Undergraduates and graduate students of Latin-American origin can win awards ranging from $50 to $1,000 from the League of United Latin-American Citizens (LULAC). Write to LULAC, 400 First St. N.W., Suite 716, Washington, D.C. 20001.

—Puerto Rican students living in certain areas of New York City can receive up to $700 in Aspira's Mayor's Scholarship Program. Aspira also helps students find other forms of financial aid. Write to Aspira, 200 Park Ave. South, Room 1511, New York, N.Y. 10003.

Tender Loving Cash for Women

You know that Clairol can change your hair color, but did you know that it can change your money blues into scholarship green?

If you're a woman 30 or older, you are eligible to receive up to $1,000 a year in the Clairol Loving Care Scholarship Program. Almost 200 women a year receive the scholarships, which may be used for tuition, books, transportation, or child care. Awards are based on an applicant's need, academic record, and potential for success in the business world. Winners are selected by the Business and Professional Women's Foundation.

For a rundown on this program and other scholarship opportunities for women, write Educational Financial Aids Sources for Women, Clairol Loving Care Scholarship Program, 345 Park Ave., New York, N.Y. 10022.

Quarter-Million-Dollar Babies

One hundred fifty people who can't read, spell their names, or do simple math have received scholarships to the Rochester Institute of Technology. In fact, the recipients still wear diapers, and their only qualification for the $1,500 scholarships was being born on the right day—June 12, 1979.

The unusual scholarship program, funded by a trustee gift, was initiated to mark the school's 150th anniversary. The only requirement for scholarship winners was that they be able to gain admission to RIT when they reach college age in 1997.

(Ful) Bright Ideas For Graduates

What do singer-songwriter Kris Kristofferson, New Jersey Senator Bill Bradley, and L.A. Rams quarterback Pat Hayden have in common?

After college, all three were awarded two years of study in Oxford, England, as winners of the prestigious Rhodes Scholarship. Of the hundreds of scholarships awarded to graduate students, the Rhodes is perhaps the most glamorous. Rhodes scholars, chosen from 17 countries for scholastic, athletic, and leadership ability, receive a generous allowance in addition to having their educational and travel costs paid. The scholarship is open to unmarried graduates between 18 and 24. Deadline for application is October 31.

Other well-known graduate awards include the Marshall Scholarship (covering two years' study of any subject at a British university), the Fulbright Grant (offering graduates the chance to carry out a fully funded study project of their choice overseas), and the Danforth Fellowship (for graduate students planning to get a Ph.D. and go into college teaching in a liberal arts field). Most of these scholarships require you to be nominated by your school, and application deadlines generally fall in October and November. Application forms are available on most campuses.

For information on other sources of graduate scholarships, consult the dean of the grad school you plan to attend, or write for The Graduate Programs and Admissions Manual (available for Social Sciences and Education; Agricultural, Biological, and Health Sciences; Arts and Humanities; and Physical Sciences, Mathematics, and Engineering). The manuals are $4 each and can be obtained by writing The Graduate Programs and Admissions Manual, P.O. Box 2606, Princeton, N.J. 08540.

ROTC: Uniform Appeal

You want money for college, and Uncle Sam wants you. So why not make a deal with him and join the Reserve Officers' Training Corps (ROTC)?

The ROTC Scholarship Program, offered by the Army, Navy, Air Force, and Marines, will cover your full tuition, plus books and fees, and provide $100 a month while you are in school. To qualify, you must be a freshman or sophomore, at least 17, and be able to finish college before age 25. You must also be a U.S. citizen.

Although programs vary, you can expect to take some military-related courses, participate in drills, and attend summer camp. ROTC scholarship holders are also expected to serve at least four years' active duty after graduation.

For more information, see your school's ROTC recruiter or write: Army ROTC, Fort Monroe, Va. 23651; Air Force ROTC, Recruiting Division, Maxwell Air Force Base, Ala. 36112; Navy Recruiting Command (Code 314), 4015 Wilson Blvd., Arlington, Va. 22203; Commandant of the Marine Corps (Code MPRO), Headquarters, U.S. Marine Corps, Washington, D.C. 20380.

Cash In on Your Quirks

What's in a name? It could be $1,000 if you attend Yale and your name is DeForest or Leavenworth. And Harvard has funds for needy people named Anderson, Baxendale, Borden, Bright, Downer, Haven, Murphy, or Pennoyer.

There are hundreds of scholarships that will award you funds simply for your name, nationality, habits, or hobbies. So if you've been left out in the great scholarship search, don't despair—read on and cash in on your quirks.

—If you love good wine, this might raise your spirits: The American Society of Enologists (wine-makers) gives scholarships to students of enology or viticulture or related fields. The scholarships can be used at a variety of institutions.

—Clean living pays off. Bucknell University in Lewisburg, Pennsylvania, awards scholarships to financially strapped students who don't use alcohol, tobacco, or narcotics, or engage in "strenuous athletic contests." Eight to 10 winners a year divide as much as $30,000.

—On the other hand, there's the left-hander's scholarship offered by Juniata College in Huntingdon, Pennsylvania. The fund was set up by alumnus Fredrick Beckley, a left-hander, who met his future wife when his tennis coach paired the two southpaws as partners in his freshman year. Four needy lefties receive $300 each for the academic year at Juniata.

Going After a Loan

A loan can furnish the money you need to learn—before you start to earn.

Borrowing: Tips on Breaking the Red Tape

You might be able to get a loan for college, you say, if only you could wade through all that red tape and decipher all that financial mumbo-jumbo. But applying for and obtaining a loan isn't all that difficult if you take it step by step.

First you need the appropriate application. Forms for federal loan programs can be obtained at your college financial aid office or regional Office of Education. Other forms are available from individual lenders.

Second, you'll need to determine the maximum amount you can afford to borrow and the time it will take you to repay it. Compare interest rates. Federally backed loans run 3 to 7 percent annually, while commercial loans can cost you 12 percent or more. Find out the "true annual interest rate"—the amount you'll actually be paying.

Taking out a commercial loan requires a little more homework than getting a federally sponsored loan. You—and your parents, who will probably be cosigning the loan—should find out whether you're required to purchase extra insurance and whether you can increase the frequency and amount of repayment. What is the charge for missing a payment?

Keep in mind that all loans—federal, state, commercial, or whatever—must be repaid. To repay a $6,000 loan at 7 percent interest requires payments of $118.81 per month for five years. Will you be able to swing it?

Finally, with any kind of loan, don't sign anything until you understand everything. Shop around for the best interest rate. Don't be reluctant to ask questions. After all, you'll be living with your obligation for years.

—Katie McManus
Junior at Albion College and holder of a Guaranteed Student Loan

"Nobody should have to quit school because they can't handle the costs. Getting a loan took a lot of time and energy, but it was worth it."

Dialing for Dollars

The federal Student Information Center hotline provides a fast, friendly, and personal approach to your search for funds.

The hotline can give you information on any of the loan, grant, and scholarship programs administered by the Department of Education. It can put you on the right track to your home state's programs, and can even give you the names of banks in your area that are authorized lenders under the Guaranteed Student Loan Program.

Information on special aids for older students, minorities, and the handicapped is available through the hotline, and its personnel will mail you financial aid applications and booklets. Call 1-800-638-6700 nationwide, or 1-800-492-6602 in Maryland.

Parental Loan Program

About 20 private colleges are easing the tuition squeeze on middle-income families by offering loans at low interest rates.

The Parental Loan Program aids parents whose incomes are roughly $20,000 to $60,000—too much to qualify for financial aid, yet often not enough to cover tuition at an expensive private school. Interest rates on the loans range from 7½ to 12 percent, with funds provided by individual schools. Stanford University lends $2 to $3 million per year, with the typical loan averaging $4,500. Other participating schools include Harvard, Princeton, Wellesley, and Mills College.

Default: Don't Do It

A word about default: Don't.

With nearly $1 billion in delinquent payments to collect, the days when schools or the government wouldn't take the trouble to track down students who failed to repay educational loans are over. Threatened by cuts in federal funds, schools are pushing hard to collect over $700 million in delinquent National Direct Student Loan money. And the government, aided by a beefed-up staff of over 600 collectors, is chasing after the more than $288 million still outstanding in the federally run Guaranteed Student Loan Program.

The default problem peaked in the '70s as a result of lax collection efforts and borrowers' confusion about the necessity for repayment. Today, schools and the government are turning to a variety of proven collection methods: computerized billing systems, which remind borrowers of their debt each month; the Internal Revenue Service, which provides up-to-date address information; and private collection agencies, whose incentive is a commission of up to 30 percent of the money they collect.

Defaulters who have actively ducked repayment are taken to court when caught. Those judged to be merely negligent usually pay when tracked down. And those who can't pay because of financial problems usually get an extension.

On all sides, the message is clear: If you take out a government loan, be prepared to pay it back.

Guaranteed Student Loans: Take an Interest in Your Future

Uncle Sam's Guaranteed Student Loan (GSL) Program can be a real help for students who might have trouble qualifying for conventional need-based sources of aid.

The terms are attractive: you can borrow up to $7,500 at only 7 percent interest, and you don't have to make any payments until after you graduate. (Graduate students can borrow up to $15,000, including undergraduate money.) And the requirements are simple enough: be a U.S. citizen, attend college at least half-time, and find a bank that will arrange the loan for you.

That last requirement may be trickier than you think. In some parts of the country—especially the East—getting a GSL is fairly easy. But in others—most notably the West—it can be just plain impossible.

Part of the problem is that the GSL program guarantees money to the lenders, but not necessarily to you. This means that the banks have access to federal funds in making student loans—but if they decide not to lend you money, there's nothing you can do. Many banks don't like to issue student loans because of high default rates, low profit yield, and the barrage of paperwork involved.

One of the reasons for the program's success in states like New York and Massachusetts is the establishment of state guaranty agencies. Such agencies insure lenders against financial loss, making student loans more attractive to them. About 40 states now utilize guaranty agencies.

What if you end up trudging from bank to bank, seeking a loan? "It's easier to get a loan from your home bank," says Dennis Kernahan of the federal government's Student Loan Marketing Association. "We've found that 70 percent of students getting loans had a previous relationship with the bank."

Commercial banks aren't the only lenders authorized to issue GSLs. Credit unions, savings and loan associations, insurance companies, even your college may be able to give you a hand. Loan applications and a list of participating lenders in your area can be obtained from your school or the Office of Education.

National Direct Student Loans

Offering an interest rate of only 3 percent with up to 10 years to pay, the National Direct Student Loan (NDSL) Program has helped millions of students stay in school. NDSLs, administered by individual schools under a federal program, are the cheapest money you can borrow for college.

This year, about 900,000 students who show financial need will borrow over $649 million in NDSL funds. They'll receive up to $5,000 for four years of undergraduate school, or up to $10,000 (including undergraduate money) for graduate school.

NDSLs are awarded directly by your school as part of your financial aid package. To get an NDSL, you're required by most colleges to fill out either the Family Financial Statement (FFS) of the American College Testing Program or the Financial Aid Form (FAF) of the College Scholarship Service. The information about your family's finances determines your need and your eligibility for the program.

NDSL funds may be used for all college expenses. You get the money directly by check, as a credit on your bill, or as a combination of the two. You don't begin to repay your loan until nine months after you graduate or leave school. Though exceptions are sometimes made, you can expect to pay at least $360 per year.

Maura Shannon: Living on Borrowed Time

Facing graduation, a job hunt, and at least $7,000 in loans to repay, Maura Shannon, 21, a Boston University senior, wonders what she got herself into.

"I feel like I've signed my life away," she says. "I can't keep all the loans straight."

But with three brothers in college, a father who's retired, and a tuition of $4,720 to pay, Shannon knows that the loans are a necessity if she's to get the kind of education she wants. Her obligations include a university loan, National Direct Student Loan funds, and money from a credit union. First payments are due nine months after Shannon graduates next year.

"I can't think about the trouble I'll be in," she says. "Hopefully I'll have a good job, and then it'll be a matter of keeping my head above water until I'm financially set."

Shannon has resolved to pay back all her loans on time—even if it means scrimping on living expenses. Her advice to other students thinking of taking out loans: "Know what you're doing. Don't blindly sign the forms, cross your fingers, and hope it will come out right."

Tuition Fund

Imagine a loan program that would offer up to $5,000 per year regardless of financial need, with repayment that would stretch out over your entire working life.

The Tuition Advance Fund, which Congress will be considering this fall, is the brainchild of Boston University president John R. Silber. Under the plan, upperclassmen could borrow funds without filling out complicated financial statements. After graduation, they would repay the advance plus a 50 percent surcharge in small monthly payments geared to their salaries.

Charge It!

"Don't leave home without it!" warns one of the nation's largest credit card issuers. The slogan may soon become "Don't leave for school without it!"

Paying for tuition via credit card is a growing trend on college campuses. "It's good for financing over a short period of time, because interest rates are only 1½ percent a month and you have up to 28 days before interest begins to accumulate," says William Doering, supervisor of the cashier's office at the University of Cincinnati, which accepts MasterCharge and Visa cards for books, fees, and housing as well as tuition. However, credit cards are not suited to long-term financing, since interest rates generally amount to 18 percent per year.

Working

Leading a double life—as student and employee—pays off in money and experience.

Peggy Luttrell: Nonstop Student

She's not a professional magician, but Peggy Luttrell performs an impressive juggling act. As a graduate student in interior design at the University of Tennessee, she holds down a full-time job and works on her degree at the same time.

A typical day begins with a class from 8 to 10 a.m., then continues with work as a counselor at a mental health institute until 5 p.m. Before dinner Luttrell runs a few miles, then heads for the design lab and works on projects until midnight.

Although her job frees her from worries about financing school, she finds it takes discipline and constant organization to keep up with the demands on her time.

"A person must be able to work for long-term goals," she says. "For instance, I know I can't go out and drink beer with my friends tonight because two years from now I want to have my degree."

—LAURA SHANLEY
M.B.A. candidate and business representative for Pacific Telephone

"I'd rather get work experience and go to school at the same time. It's a more realistic atmosphere and a chance to make business contacts that could be important to me."

Making a Part-Time Job Work for You

Whether it's to raise cash for college, get some valuable experience in the "real world," or escape the craziness of dorm life, you may want to join the 2.7 million college students who work part time while going to school.

The first question to answer about a part-time job is: Do I have the time? Any money or experience you could earn by working has to be weighed against the possible cost of failing a test or dropping from exhaustion. Millions of working students do well in school, but you should consider carefully the effect work will have on your academic career.

The first step in looking for a part-time job is to make a list of your skills—how fast you can type, what musical instruments you can play—anything and everything that might sell you to an employer. List the jobs you've had in the past and what you'd like to do in the future. You might want to work up a brief resume.

Then ask around. Your friends, enemies, professors, mailman, and anyone else breathing may be the source of a job. Check with your school's employment office, read the help-wanted ads, and call federal and state employment services. Think seasonally. Around Christmas, department stores take on tons of help. In the summer, camps and playgrounds need counselors and coaches. Find out what's out there!

In general, you should look for a job that offers hours suited to your class schedule. Your employer, however, should know you're in school and that under unusual circumstances—during finals, for instance—you may need time off. Don't take on too many hours; for a full-time student, 20 hours a week are usually enough to handle.

Consider volunteer work. Though working at an animal hospital or writing for a community newspaper may pay nothing, the experience can be valuable. In the long run, you may earn more by spending a little time volunteering rather than going for the money right away.

Enterprising Ideas

If you'd like to go into business for yourself, consider one of the following enterprising ideas:

- Sell something students want—doughnuts during study hours, tennis balls at wholesale prices, plants grown from cuttings.
- Work as a campus marketing representative for major magazines, life insurance companies, stereo manufacturers, or travel services.
- Tap the parent market—mail postcards to parents offering services like custom-decorated birthday cakes and exam-time "care packages."
- Market your knowledge—give tennis lessons, or conduct classes in exercise, French, or basic car repair.
- Earn your car's keep by starting a shuttle service to local airports and bus stations.
- Start a wake-up service, a typing service, or a babysitting service.

20 Common Campus Jobs

According to a survey of colleges across the country, these are campus jobs frequently held by students:

- accompanist
- bookkeeping clerk
- campus tour leader
- cashier
- darkroom technician
- dormitory receptionist
- food-service worker
- grader
- library assistant
- lifeguard
- mail clerk
- maintenance worker
- model for art classes
- photographer
- research assistant
- residential adviser
- switchboard operator
- teaching assistant
- tutor
- typist

Co-ops and Internships: Experience Is the Best Teacher

If you need money, but punching in at the local fast-food palace isn't your idea of a well-rounded education, you might look into an internship or cooperative-education program.

Internships and co-ops are similar: Both provide insights into the realities of day-to-day work in your field, and may lead to full-time jobs after graduation. But there are differences.

Co-ops generally involve formal programs which alternate terms of classroom study with terms of full-time, paid work for an outside employer. Students usually receive credit for their work. Internships, on the other hand, may be paid or voluntary, and do not automatically provide college credit. In many cases, locating an internship opportunity is up to you.

More than 200,000 students participate in co-op programs each year. Because of their growing popularity with students and employers alike, about 1,000 schools now offer programs in a variety of fields, ranging from art and architecture to engineering, business, and journalism.

Co-op salaries vary as well. Latest figures show that students in fields like business and engineering pull down the highest pay, averaging $165 to $215 a week. Students in other majors can earn as much as $180 a week, although some work for the minimum wage.

Like co-opers, interns get practical, on-the-job experience. Recognizing the value of student employees, an increasing number of public-service organizations, government agencies, and private businesses are making internships available to undergraduates, graduate students, and recent grads. Although many established internships are government-related and clustered in the Washington, D.C. area, a student with a good academic record and a little initiative should not have a problem setting up his or her own program.

The Duke Labor Pool

When the last touchdown has been scored and the fans have gone home, who cleans up the football stadium?

At Duke University, members of the Student Labor Pool do. On Sunday mornings, these students gather at the field to begin this 10-hour task. The labor pool, open to all Duke students, offers participants the chance to work part time—while setting their own hours—to earn pocket money or needed tuition funds.

Students can work from 20 hours a week to as little as 10 hours a month at such jobs as raking leaves, serving at banquets, washing windows, and running concession stands. The labor pool, which pays $2.90 an hour for general labor, is run with the cooperation of the university physical plant and the local union.

Employer-Paid Tuition

If you can't afford the cost of your education, perhaps you can persuade your boss to foot the bill.

Prompted by the Revenue Act of 1978, which allows tax write-offs for employees' school costs, an increasing number of employers are paying all or part of their employees' tuition. At Seattle University, over half the students in the M.B.A. program have employer-paid tuition, averaging $5,700 per student.

"It's another type of incentive besides a salary increase or bonus," explains Chauncey Burke, admissions and placement counselor at the Seattle business school. "It also gives students a chance to develop additional skills that will make them more valuable employees."

Margin-to-Margin Profits

There once was a student who couldn't type. Knowing there were others like him, he opened up a campus typing service. He didn't learn how to type, but he learned a lot about business. He also made a lot of money.

Derek Lennon, a senior at Northwestern, started Nonnel's Typists and Secretarial Services a year and a half ago because he needed money for tuition and room and board. He began the service from his dorm room, hiring university secretaries to do the typing.

After several months, he proceeds to set up an office close to campus. By the end of the first year, he'd made the cost of his tuition and more, and had enough orders for term papers and resumes to support three full-time typists and a backup crew of part-timers during the end-of-semester rush.

Owning his own business has taught him lessons he never could have learned in the classroom, says Lennon, a history and communications major. "My way of being graded is seeing how much money I make or lose," he adds.

Job Sharing

It's called job sharing, and it works like this: two people share one full-time job, splitting responsibilities and hours as well as pay and benefits.

Students looking for work as a team should find a partner whose talents complement their own, says Willie Heller of New Ways To Work, a job counseling and referral center in San Francisco. Understand the needs of the employer, then submit a proposal showing how you could handle the job. Jobs which lend themselves to sharing include day-care center positions, clerical work, and library jobs.

Banking on Beauty

For the sake of education, twin sisters attending Stanford periodically trade the glaring fluorescent bulbs in the library for the bright lights of the runway.

Renee and Ramona Rolle, who started working on their master's degrees in petroleum engineering this fall, view beauty pageants as a way to earn extra money for school expenses. They began entering contests as undergraduates and have since won a variety of titles and prizes. So far, their largest cash award has been $700. "Contests are a great way to get money for books and for transportation home during breaks," says Renee.

The limelight beckons male students as well. For example, there's the annual Prince Charming Contest in Baton Rouge, Louisiana, in which the winner (judged on "personality, grooming, and talent") receives a $1,000 college scholarship plus $1,000 for emcee work at Cinderella Girl state pageants.

Money In Reserve

Question: What part-time employer can put up to $2,000 toward your college education, will let you choose the kind of work you'd like to do, and then will train you to do it?

Answer: The United States Army.

In an effort to attract young men and women to its two part-time service branches—the National Guard and the Army Reserve—the Army is offering you a bonus when you enlist in many units. The bonus can either be $1,500 in cash or $500 a year (up to $2,000) toward your college tuition and fees.

If you're willing to work one weekend a month, serve two weeks a year, and go through the Army's basic training program, joining the National Guard or the Army Reserve is a great way to pick up money, skill, and experience. Besides a bonus, here's what you can get for being a part-time soldier:

- Money. The National Guard or Army Reserve is a job, and you'll be paid for the hours you put in during your six-year enlistment. Pay is $419 a month during basic and individual skills training. After training you'll make about $56 each weekend.
- Training and experience. The skills you acquire in the Guard or Reserve can enhance your college education and give you a valuable edge in the job-hunting jungle.
- Pension. A rare benefit for a part-time job, it allows you to retire after 20 years and start receiving retirement benefits at age 60.

For more information about the Army National Guard, write or call your local National Guard armory or state military office. For information about the Army Reserve, write or call your local Army recruiter (in the Yellow Pages under "Recruiting"). The Air National Guard and the Air Force Reserve have similar programs which you might want to check out.

The Word On Work-Study

Almost a million students hold down part-time jobs on and off campus under College Work-Study, a $550 million federal program designed to help collegians earn while they learn. This year, Congress has added $70 million to the work-study budget, opening up an estimated 145,000 jobs for students who need extra earnings to meet their college expenses.

Under the work-study program, students work an average of eight to 12 hours per week, with the federal government paying up to 80 percent of their salaries. The 3,250 participating schools are responsible for covering the remainder.

Thousands of students in work-study are library assistants, dorm receptionists, and cafeteria helpers. But others, such as those at Oberlin College in Ohio, can undertake less-routine jobs, such as joining the local police for night patrol or taking care of the mentally retarded.

Most work-study jobs pay the minimum wage of $2.90 or more, although schools on a shoestring budget are allowed to pay 85 percent of the current minimum wage, stretching funds in order to give more students the chance to participate. Though earnings vary, the average student on work-study pulls down $620 during the school year.

Work-study is administered as part of your financial aid package. You are eligible if you demonstrate financial need, are at least a half-time student, and have not defaulted on a federally insured loan. To apply, you should fill out an application at your school's financial aid office.

If you qualify, the office will try to find you a job that complements your class schedule and, if possible, your career plans. Your wage will vary depending on your need, the kind of job available, and the proficiency required. At Purdue, students who assist in the financial aid office can earn $3.80 or more an hour.

Under the program, you may also work for a nonprofit agency, such as the YMCA or a social-service organization. The only provision is that your job cannot be politically or religiously affiliated.

Since work-study opportunities have increased by 26 percent since last year, it doesn't hurt to apply, even if you've tried in the past and were turned down. The expanded program may have room for you.

Credit By Exam And Other Money-Saving Shortcuts

You've heard it before: Time is money. When the average cost of a college education is broken down, each hour spent in class can cost $8 or more. An increasing number of students, however, are saving both time and money by finishing college ahead of schedule in one of the following ways:

Credit by Exam. Last year more than 50,000 students at over 2,100 schools received credit through the College Level Examination Program (CLEP). Initiated to give students credit for what they've learned on their own, CLEP offers 52 exams (generally multiple choice) in subjects ranging from the humanities to hematology. The tests are given during the third week of each month at 900 locations throughout the country. The fee for each exam is $20, and three to six credit hours are awarded for passing scores, which are determined by individual schools. For information on test offerings and subject matter covered, write to the College Board, Box 2815, Princeton, N.J. 08541, or call 609-921-9000.

Another nationwide credit by examination option is PEP—the Proficiency Examination Program. Administered by the American College Testing Program, PEP offers 47 tests for fees of $35 to $175, depending on complexity of subject matter. Some tests are multiple choice, some are essay, and all are offered four times a year. For information, write to the ACT Proficiency Examination Program, Box 168, Iowa City, Iowa 52243, or call 319-356-3711.

A variety of other credit-by-exam programs are offered by public and private groups. New York residents can participate in the Regents External Degree Examination Program, for example. Ask your school which exam programs it will give credit for, or pick up a copy of Getting College Course Credits by Examination To Save $$$, by Gene Hawes, McGraw-Hill, 1979, $6.95, which lists institutions honoring the results of proficiency exams and gives advice on preparing for individual tests.

Carrying a Heavy Load. Adding one or two courses a semester to your normal load may shorten your college career by a year or more. Although some schools charge extra for additional courses, taking them may be more economical in the long run. Before you adopt this strategy, make sure you can handle the extra work. Flunking out, taking an incomplete, or dying of exhaustion saves you nothing.

Going to School Year 'Round. It may be worth your while to get through school quickly and enter the working world as soon as possible, particularly if you can get by without the earnings from a full-time summer job. Schools on a quarter or trimester system make it particularly easy to follow this strategy since most courses are offered year 'round. A bonus: Some schools offer cut rates during the summer to attract students.

Do-It-Yourself Diplomacy

When he enrolled at Pace University last summer, 16-year-old Emil Berendt had never attended a college class or talked with a college professor. Yet he already had a bachelor's degree in economics and 126 college credits to his name.

Berendt collected his credits while still a high school senior through an external-degree program administered by the New York State Board of Regents. He studied at home to pass a combination of multiple-choice tests, including College Level Examination Program (CLEP) exams and the Graduate Record Examinations (GREs). The degree cost him only the test fees ($320), plus the price of a few textbooks.

Berendt, who entered Pace to study accounting, doesn't plan to stay the full four years. By combining his coursework with previously earned credits and taking five more equivalency exams, he will earn his second bachelor's degree by the end of the year.

—BRIAN CONSIDINE
Built up funds to attend Southern Illinois University by spending two years at an inexpensive community college and working part time.

"The tuition was about half as much as a four-year school, and I kept my expenses way down by living at home and carpooling to school with friends."

A Penny Saved . . .

Every night, Kelly Murphy deposited her loose pennies and nickels in a shoe box. By the end of the school year, the Marquette University junior had saved $130—enough for a sky's-the-limit night on the town with her boyfriend. "You should have seen the banker's face when we dumped 6,000 pennies on the counter!" she recalls.

Smart Idea: Prepaid Tuition

About 165 students at Washington University don't have to worry about inflation's effect on college fees. Under the St. Louis school's Tuition Stabilization Plan (TSP), they've prepaid two to four years' tuition at last year's rate of $4,300 and are protected against future increases.

With tuitions rising 9 percent or more each year, paying on the front end saves money. Students whose families can't come up with the four-year total of $17,000 can borrow it from the university at 9 percent interest, which still beats the long-term rate of inflation.

TSP seems to be catching on. At least a hundred other schools have indicated an interest in the plan.

Cutting Costs Through Cooperation

Over 7,000 college students across the country have found living quarters that combine the convenience of a dorm, the freedom of an apartment, and the economy of living at home. They live in cooperative houses, known as co-ops.

The idea behind co-ops is simple. Instead of paying someone to maintain a residence and cook the meals, co-opers share the work among themselves, shaving as much as 50 percent off the cost of room and board. "We work only four hours a week, but we save $400 a semester on the cost of living in a dorm," says Barb Weston, director of the Ark, a 100-member co-op house at the University of Texas.

Frugal living isn't the only appeal of co-ops. The Ark holds Friday-evening "happy hours," where residents assemble in the rec room for beer and socializing. Members also hold regular meetings to define house rules and make spending decisions.

Students who want to find out about existing co-op houses or start one of their own can write the North American Students for Cooperation (NASCO), P.O. Box 7293, Ann Arbor, Mich. 48107.

Simple Strategies To Save You $

Tuition and fees aren't the only college costs that are flattening student pocketbooks. Everything from textbooks to toothpaste and typing paper is going to set you back more this year. To keep expenses at a bearable level, you might want to try some of the following strategies collected from thrifty students around the country.

—Take full advantage of your student status. A valid student ID can get you discounts at movie theaters and local businesses, generous travel discounts, and special rates on magazine subscriptions. Read bulletin boards and student newspapers carefully to keep up with good deals.

—Cut grocery costs by buying at a food co-op. If you do buy at a local market, check newspapers for specials and coupons—both of which can shave dollars off your grocery bill. Most papers run major food advertising on Wednesday or Thursday. Buying in quantity and shopping when you are not hungry can also save you cash.

—When you need aspirin or common over-the-counter medicines, make a house call at your campus health center. Most will provide nonprescription drugs free, and many offer a discount on prescription medicine, to boot. Some health centers will lend you supplies like heating pads, vaporizers, and Ace bandages when you need them.

—Don't waste money on textbooks you'll only open a few times. Try sharing nonessential texts with a friend or using copies on reserve in the library. When a textbook is required, save money by buying it secondhand or splitting the cost with several classmates.

—If a weekly collect call home is part of your routine, you might want to dial direct and send your parents the bill when it comes in. By dialing direct, you save as much as 60 percent, particularly if you call in the evenings and on weekends.

—Traveling home for the holidays can sink even the best-launched budget. Make your plans as far in advance as possible to take advantage of airline excursion fares and special vacation charters your school may offer.

—Don't waste your money on duplicate medical insurance. Before paying for coverage through your school, see if you are still covered under your parents' policy. Many company plans cover children of employees as long as they are still dependent and in school.

Tips on everything from establishing in-state residency to furnishing a student apartment cheaply to nailing down likely sources of financial aid are covered in College Knowledge. Organized along the lines of a catalog, the 383-page book is crammed with ideas and sources of information that can make a student's life easier. A warning: Some of the addresses listed are out of date. College Knowledge, by Michael Edelhart, Anchor Books, 1979, $7.95.

The Ins and Outs Of State Residency

Delivering pizzas may not seem like the most profitable way to spend the summer, but it saved Brad Duckett $4,500.

By living and working in Moscow, Idaho, before beginning his junior year at the University of Idaho, the 20-year-old architecture major established in-state residency and trimmed $1,500 off his tuition bill. In the three years it will take to complete his degree, he expects to save at least $4,500.

"I came here because it was an excellent school in my field, and I established residency to save money," explains the California native. "I saw no reason to pay $1,974 in out-of-state tuition when I could be paying $474 as a state resident."

Requirements for residency vary from state to state and school to school. In some areas, you must be 21 and demonstrate complete independence from your parents. Most states require you to maintain a permanent address for a year or more, register to vote, obtain a driver's license, and pay state income taxes. Admissions offices at public universities are usually the best sources for up-to-date information on their state's residency requirements.

Using Your Financial Aid Office

It's your guide through the jungle of forms, fine print, and frustrations.

What Your Financial Aid Office Can Do for You

Where do you go to find the latest information on scholarships, grants, and loans? That's easy—the financial aid office.

And what campus office can furnish you with a credit reference? It may surprise you to know that the financial aid office does this, too.

"I've written thousands of references in my time for students," says Allan W. Purdy, who retired in September after over 20 years as director of financial aid services at the University of Missouri at Columbia. "The office is a good source of credit references for those who have had a loan and kept up payments, or have had a job and proven dependable." What else can your financial aid office do for you?

- dispense federal and state grant money*. Students can get applications and informational material at the office.*
- administer campus-based loans under the National Direct Student Loan Program and other public and private programs.
- list part-time jobs available on and off campus.
- help you determine the amount of financial aid you need*, and work with you to establish an aid package with some combination of scholarship, grant, loan, or work-study funds.*
- advise you in financial planning and help you set up a budget to cover college costs.
- offer counseling on how to balance an academic load and a part-time job.
- notarize documents such as an affidavit of educational purpose, which the government requires before grant money can be released.
- provide reference books and pamphlets on government programs and other sources of funds.
- counsel you on applying for a loan and advise you about interest rates and repayment schedules.
- in emergencies*, provide help with pressing college expenses. "Practically every financial aid office has an emergency fund to temporarily help students whose resources have been diminished due to uncontrollable circumstances," says Purdy.*

Dollarwise Advice From Financial Aid Officers

GOLDIE CLAIBORNE
Director of Financial Aid and Student Employment
Howard University

"Half the students I see don't plan for the total cost of their education—in fact, many don't know what the cost actually is. Sit down, work out a budget. Keep track of every dollar you spend. If you need help, file an application on time!"

JACK HUGHES
Director of Financial Aid
Florida Institute of Technology

"Students have traditionally walked into financial aid offices on their knees, ready to accept whatever is offered. Since most aid officers are too busy to go that extra mile for every student, you should get involved, ask questions, and take on some of the responsibility of finding ways to pay for school."

MARLENE SHETTEL
Director of Financial Aid
College of Law
Cleveland State University

"I lie in bed and my stomach knots up when I think of all the students who come in with $17,000 worth of loans on their backs. If you're planning on graduate school, it might make more sense to work for a year or two after college instead of taking on more obligations."

GABRIEL CAPETO
Director of Financial Aid
University of San Francisco

"Working, whether it's work-study or a part-time job off campus, is a good idea. In fact, work experience could give you an edge in the job market. Employers are impressed by students who can go to school and work 15 to 20 hours a week, too."

JAMES BELVIN
Director of Financial Aid
Duke University

"The biggest problem is that students don't know what's available to them. Make sure the financial aid office knows your situation. Make them understand! And don't forget to investigate all possible sources of money—including the variety of scholarships offered by private organizations."

With a Little Help From Your Friends

Burdened by mounting paperwork and small staffs, many financial aid offices are turning to peer counseling—students helping students—to reduce the hassle and confusion of getting money for college.

At the University of Tennessee, 10 student counselors receive $3.50 an hour in work-study money to answer questions, help fill out forms, distribute information, and organize financial aid seminars. Thanks to the extra manpower, full-time staff members are freed to put together financial aid packages, monitor constantly changing programs, and deal with special student problems.

"We had to go through the same problems as the students we are advising," explains Gary Mitchell, a UT peer counselor. "That seems to give us better rapport." Mitchell's advice to students planning to seek aid: "Apply early, and be patient."

Shelly Liebman: Persistence Pays

"Most kids have no idea what goes on in the financial aid office," says Shelly Liebman, a graduate student in management at Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute in Troy, New York. "If students do take the trouble to fill out the forms, they just accept what the people in the office say they are going to get. But there's really a lot you can do."

Liebman should know because he's done it all. As an RPI undergraduate, he applied for and received a National Direct Student Loan and was placed on the school's work-study program. To take some of the burden off his parents, he raised tuition money by joining the Army Reserve, washing dishes, selling Time subscriptions, and working as a night manager for a car-rental agency. Today, he holds down a coveted graduate teaching assistantship and sells insurance on the side.

Throughout his college career, Liebman has bargained with the financial aid office so frequently that staffers know him by name. "You have to ask for help and push for what you want," he advises. "I've learned to double-check everything. If they say, 'We can't give you this,' I say, 'Why?' and ask to see my file. Because I've made an effort, they are more willing to spend time with me and go out of their way to help."

Unwrapping Your Aid Package

Though your school calls it a package, it's not a gift, and you should make sure that your financial aid award meets your specific educational and financial needs.

The first thing to do is figure out the percentage of gift money—scholarships and grants—in your current package versus the percentage of self-help funds—loans and work-study. The higher the percentage of no-cost scholarships and grants, the better off you are.

Once you've determined what you have and what you need, the key to bringing it all together is your financial aid office.

Many schools are relying on a greater percentage of self-help money to fill their aid packages, forcing students to take out more loans or work longer hours than they had counted on. Working closely with your aid counselor can prevent a drastic or unexpected change in your package next year.

Fear of Forms—Unfounded!

The FAF. The FFS. The BEOG. Sometimes just the thought of filling out a financial aid application can send your head swimming in alphabet soup.

But there's good news. The new Common Form, developed by the government to be used to apply for a Basic Educational Opportunity Grant (BEOG), and other aid next year, has been specially designed for ease of completion. (However, the new form is so simple that many financial aid officers will ask you to fill out a supplementary form to give them the detailed financial information they need to allocate aid.)

Many schools still require you to use the traditional forms—the Financial Aid Form (FAF), put out by the College Scholarship Service, and the Family Financial Statement (FFS), administered by the American College Testing Program. Filling out these forms is really not hard, if you keep the following guidelines in mind:

- Be prepared*. Make a financial aid folder containing 1) your parents' income tax return, 2) your W-2 form and income tax return, if you have them, 3) bank statements from your checking and savings accounts, and 4) forms detailing any other assets and expenditures such as Social Security or medical bills. Do this as soon after January 1 as possible.*
- Read the instructions one by one—carefully*. "People tend to ignore instructions," says Bob Matuska, director of financial aid at Mankato State College in Minnesota. "They just plunge in and hope they get it right." It can be an expensive tactic. If you make a mistake or omit important information, your application may be returned to you for correction. By the time it is reprocessed, available funds may be gone.*
- Make sure you answer every question*. According to CSS, the biggest problems with the FAF are leaving questions blank, omitting Social Security numbers, providing inaccurate or inconsistent information, and leaving the form unsigned.*
- Follow up*. With the FAF, the FFS, and the Common Form, you will receive an eligibility report six weeks after you submit an application. The results are sent to your school, provided you checked the appropriate box and sent the $5 fee when you filed (there is no fee when you apply for a BEOG). After receiving your report, go to your financial aid office and fill out the college's form, if it is required. All information should be given to your financial aid counselor who will review it, decide on an award, and notify you of the decision.*
- Be sure to keep copies of all your documents and reports*. You might need them if questions arise.*

Artists stage campus protest of...'nothing'

By VICTORIA JONES
Collegian Staff

At UMass, it seems, there's a protest for every occasion. On any given day at the University, it seems, passersby can hear students to the left, to the right and in the middle, espousing their viewpoints.

Yesterday, however, there was a demonstration to end all demonstrations. Four students and a professor, standing outside the Campus Center, protested against a unique cause.

Nothing.

Art Prof. John Grillo and the four others, members of the UMass Performance Art group, said protesting against nothing was their way of "releasing inhibitions." When the loud, hour-long demonstration ended, group members said they felt "released."

Grillo and the students-Frank Brunelle, Jean Pichey, Sally Roy and Margaret Sackman—carried blank signs and handed out blank pamphlets.

The protestors wore pieces of driftwood on their arms and backs, and sported sombreros on their heads. The group carried black megaphones with vents in them.

Students reacting to the protest generally called it "weird."

The Performance Art group, begun four years ago by Grillo and another professor, Lionel Gongorn, offers a class begun this semester which concentrates on new art forms.

The protest, it seemed, represented such an art form.

"Art cannot be real life, but life can be art," Grillo said, explaining the group's philosophy.

The class, which has 16 members, will give a free performance Nov. 27 in Hampden Auditorium in the Southwest Residential Area.

Carter calls on N.E. to save

By JANE ANDERSON
Associated Press

PROVIDENCE, R.I. — President Jimmy Carter, promising that saving energy at home can be exciting and pleasant, appealed to the patriotism of New Englanders yesterdayasking them to conserve.

Ask yourself, the president said, "What can I do as a patriotic American...What can I do to save energy in my home, going to and from work, to and from shopping, on my job?"

The president, addressing an "energy summit" of Northeast governors, promised New Englanders:

—They will have enough heating oil to warm their homes this winter.

—A limited amount of federal money is already available to help poor people pay for heat.

—More money will become available if Congress passes Carter's preferred windfall profits tax bill.

—If the muscle is stripped from that bill, it will be "a trillion-dollar giveaway to the oil companies."

—A new office called the Fuel Oil Management Group has been opened in Boston to guarantee that heat and fuel oil is delivered to where it is needed most.

—Americans must personally look for all the smaller ways to help save power.

Cartersaid, "The most important, single action that every single person in this country can take is to save energy...

"And I might point out to you that this is not an unpleasant thing, it is not an unwarranted sacrifice. It will not even be an inconvenience... It can be an exciting and productive, positive action. It can bring families together in a closer unity. It can strengthen communities. It can strengthen our nation."

New England depends more on heating oil than any other section of the country and in recent years residents have practiced saving precious fuel.

Diane Seemueller, a working housewife and mother of two from Coventry, R.I., reacted to Carter's remarks by saying, "We had insulation blown into our house...We have window quilts...We do our share.

"We're changing from oil to gas heat. We use one car...I don't know if President Carter knows how hard it is to stay warm up here," she said.

Said Carter of his profits tax measure, which is designed to make oil companies surrender some of the profit they earn from decontrolled oil prices, "I hope that every one of you will help me to convince the Congress that an adequate and acceptable windfall profits tax should be levied on the oil companies."

Reaction among the governors was mostly favorable, although some mentioned points that Carter failed to cover.

"I thought it was a very good speech and it served as a very good forum. It mobilized public favor for the windfall profits tax," said New Jersey Gov. Brendan T. Byrne.

"Unless we are willing to do something more about it — use solar, offshore oil, nuclear, and other alternative fuels — 'pretty talk' is the best description of his speech," said Massachusetts Gov. Edward J. King.

Governors support re-election bid

PROVIDENCE(AP)— Three Northeast governors attending a regional "energy summit" said yesterday they would support a renomination bid by President Carter over a challenge from Sen. Edward M. Kennedy.

Polled individually at a news conference that closed the twoday summit, Govs. Ella T. Grasso of Connecticut, Brendan T. Byrne of New Jersey and Massachusetts' Edward J. King said they would stand behind Carter.

In Washington, D.C. yesterday,Kennedy announced the formation of a "Kennedy for President Committee." Stephen Smith, the committee chairman and brother-in-law of the Massachusetts Senator, said Kennedy will formally announce his candidacy in Boston Nov.7.

"I support, endorse and will work for the renomination of President Carter," said Grasso, the new chairman of the Coalition of Northeastern Governors

"My support for the president has been clear, and you can put that any way you want," said Byrne, the outgoing chairman of the regional organization that staged the energy forum.

King, noting Carter's assurance of adequate heating-oil supplies and support of offshore-energy exploration, said he supports Carter.

Asked if that meant he will work for the President's renomination, King said, "Support, endorsement — It's the same thing."

Only Gov. J. Joseph Garrahy, host of the two-day conference billed as an "energy summit," hedged on an endorsement.

"We came here to discuss energy issues, and we've done that. I wouldn't want to spoil it by talking politics," he said.

Two other governors who attended the meeting, New York's Hugh L. Carey and Richard Thornburgh of Pennsylvania, a Republican, were not at the news conference.

Groups join to calm Boston

BOSTON (AP) — Boston clergy, public officials and private groups — including a professional football team — are trying to defuse the city's explosive racial climate which forced the blackout of a prime time network television show.

"Freedom Road," starring Muhammad Ali, was cancelled because officials feared the show would stir added racial strife.

Religious leaders yesterday announced plans for a "covenant" of racial harmony to be launched at an ecumenical convocation on Boston Common.

Cardinal Humberto Medeiros said that following the Nov. 19 service, every Bostonian will be urged to sign the "Covenant of Justice, Equity and Harmony."

Signers of the covenant, to be circulated through neighborhoods, will be given a symbolic pin to wear to show they want to be peacemakers, the leader of the Boston Catholic Archdiocese said at an ecumenical news conference.

No-nukers confront Wall Street

NEW YORK (AP) — To the beat of a brass band, more than 1,000 anti-nuclear demonstrators yesterday tried in vain to close the New York Stock Exchange on the 50th anniversary of the stock market crash.

Police reported 959 arrests in what was the largest of several anti-nuclear demonstrations across the nation.

Among the first to be arrested was Daniel Ellsberg, key figure in the Vietnam-era Pentagon Papers case.

In Washington, D.C., about 250 protesters blocked doorways to the Energy Department and rallied on Independence Avenue, and 88 persons were taken into custody during a protest at the Trident nuclear submarine base in Bangor, Maine.

In New York, scores of demonstrators jammed the exchange on Wall and Broad Streets, saying their targets were firms that finance the nuclear industry.

A group of anti-nuclear demonstrators gets into a pushing match with police outside the Department of Energy yesterday in Washington where they are protesting against the agency for being responsible for the research, development and administration of the government's nuclear weapons and energy programs as well as the allocation of winter heating fuel. Ted forms election committee

WASHINGTON (AP) — Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, "eager to get going" with his campaign for the presidency, today took a major step toward challenging President Carter with formation of a Kennedy for President Committee.

Stephen Smith, the senator's brother-in-law and chairman of the committee, told reporters that Kennedy will declare his candidacy in Boston on Nov. 7.

Establishment of the committee makes Kennedy, DMass., a candidate in the eyes of federal election laws.

At a news conference in campaign headquarters, a former Cadillac automobile showroom about a mile from the White House, Smith said: "The Kennedy For President Committee is now officially under way and we look forward to an active and successful campaign."

Smith urged the draft-Kennedy committees that have been active around the nation to "terminate their operations as unauthorized committees."

Dayan's post remains vacant

By JOEL EPSTEIN
Associated Press

TEL AVIV, Israel — Prime minister Menachem Begin failed yesterday in his first attempt to choose a new foreign minister and pull himself out of a Cabinet crisis that could topple his government.

Deputy Prime Minister Yigael Yadin turned down Begin's offer to take over the post left vacant last week by Moshe Dayan, who quit in a disagreement over the government's policy in the occupied West Bank.

Echoing Dayan's contentions, Yadin told Israel Radio "there are differences of views between our party and the majority party on some issues of foreign policy" which prevented him from accepting the job. But he added that if Begin askshim to head Israel's negotiating team on West Bank autonomy, he would reconsider his refusal.

Southwest Women's Center fights sexism on campus

By RHONDA J. MONTGOMERY
Collegian Staff

The goal of the Southwest Women's Center is to combat sexism, according to coordinator Vicki Jacoby, who runs the center with a 12-women staff. Four staff members hold paid positions, but every woman in the center has equal decision-making power, Jacoby said.

The center, founded in 1970, is located between Mackimmie and Crampton dormitories in Southwest Residential College.

The center attempts to attain its goal by offering various programs such as courses in conjunction with the Women's Studies Program, colloquia and workshops. The center also provides the community with special programs such as guest speakers, film series, women's theater production, coffee houses, art shows, pot luck dinners and other women's activities, Jacoby said. Referral and personal counseling are available at the center, along with health, job, and five-college information.

The center is co-funded by P.S.F., the Provost, and Student Actvities Trust Fund.

From Nov. 13 to 20, the center will hold an Art Festival of crafts.

On-campus evangelist calls gays 'abomination'

By NORM WHITEHURST
Collegian Staff

"Homosexuality is a mortal sin and all those who participate in it will burn in hell," proclaimed Evangelist George "Jed" Smock yesterday to People's Gay Alliance members.

Standing outside the Student Union Building and quoting passages from the Old Testament, Smock said homosexuality is an "abomination." He called the homosexuals present "hypocrites" and said that if they "really believed in Jesus Christ" they would "mend" their ways.

One alliance member challenged Smock by asking "The Bible says that it is an abomination to eat insects, rabbits, scaled fish and creatures that crawl close to the earth. If you eat these, is it as bad as being a nomosexual?" Smock ignored the question.

When other PGA members tried to present their views on homosexuality, Smock frequently ignored them and mocked them by prancing around with a "weak wrist."

"I'm confused," said a woman who later identified herself as a lesbian.

"I know you're confused," screamed Smock. "You don't even know what you are supposed to do with your body. You're all a bunch of perverts."

A Moslem student told Smock that the Moslem faith does not condemn homosexuality. Smock later said to the student, "You're dismissed."

When the crowd protested Smock's "dismissal," Smock, referring to the Moslem, said, "Follow this heathen, because you are all going to hell anyway."

Orchard Valley residents ask town's help with floods

By SEAN HARVEY
Collegian Staff

Approximately 40 residents from the Orchard Valley section of South Amherst asked the Amherst Board of Selectmen at a meeting last night that something be done to stop sewage water from entering their basements after rainstorms.

Many of the residents said they inspected foundation drains surrounding their homes and found the drains were connected to sewer drains. This is illegal, according to state law, but no one could offer an explanation as to why proper inspection procedures were not followed.

When the residents' homes were constructed, all during the 1960's, there was no town engineer building inspector to implement such procedures Director of Public Works Stanley Ziomek said.

Ziomek said inspections of some of these homes occured in 1969, 1970 and 1974 after residents complained of high levels of water in their basements after rainstorms.

"Every house which we inspected and excavated, we found to have illegal drainpipe connections," Ziomek said.

"Floods at our house are an annual event," homeowner Ronald Steele said. "We've had sewage water in our basement as high as a desk and have spent between four and five thousand dollars trying to fix the problem."

"It looks as if the entire Orchard Valley area was illegally done and not inspected properly," homeowner Daniel Mele said.

Another homeowner said he had sewage water entering his basement even when there was no rain.

The problem has existed for the past decade, but since last spring complaints have increased, Ziomek said. The selectmen could not offer any immediate solution to the problem, but said they would explore it "as soon as possible."

More Russell's...

Reading the details of the attack on several women by Amherst police inside Russell's Liquors, I have recalled a similar incident I witnessed there last month. I want to bring this fact to light. It appears that the management of the store may be the prime agitators in these attacks, and that some sort of consumer action ought to be taken against them.

On a Friday evening, at approximately 9 p.m., I entered the store to make a small purchase. I found a tall, youngish blond clerk engaged in a loud dispute with a young woman. She had presented and ID which the clerk considered insufficient legal proof of her age. Instead of simply declining to serve her (which would have been his right, and perfectly legal), he had called the Amherst police. He then forcibly restrained her from leaving the premises until the police arrived.

I was absolutely shocked. I immediately complained to the management that this practice was totally unwarranted and outrageous; that he could simply refuse to serve a patron whose ID was in question, without sending for the police and forcibly detaining the customer. I was told "Why don't you read this before you open your big mouth"—and pointed in the direction of a sign detailing the new Massachusetts liquor laws.

The new law DOES NOT mandate forcible detention of a customer who presents insufficient or questionable identification—it requires only that the proprietor refuse to serve this person.

I told the manager that I intended to make known his way of using the Amherst police to intimidate customers. When I left—vowing never to return, and to make known what I had just witnessed—the Amherst police officer was interrogating the young woman in a darkened doorway adjacent to the liquor store. (Simply as an aside, the young woman involved in this incident was blond, white, and slightly built—clearly not a threatening person.)

I lost track of the incident at that point. It now appears that this was not an aberration, but part of a systematic plot by Russell's to get customers "in trouble" with the police, for reasons known only to the proprietors themselves.

No other package store I have ever visited summons town police upon presentation of a questionable ID. They merely refuse to serve the customer, and let it go at that. I sense some manner of unhealthy alliance between Russell's management and Amherst police. I urge letters of protest to the management of Russell's, for their role in provoking the incidents which led to these recent attacks. I further urge a massive consumer boycott of Russell's, to be continued until the management produces a satisfactory explanation for its treatment of patrons.

Dave Beauvais

...temper tantrum

After reading about the Russell's liquor incident concerning Gina Stevens et. al. I decided I should speak up about what happened this spring. A woman friend of mine asked me to help pick up a keg from Russell's and bring it to her apartment. The store was fairly busy and we had to wait a few minutes to be waited on. My friend had been quoted one price, a week earlier, and then when she called to confirm, there was some question as to the actual price of the deposit.

When we got there my friend had written a check for the original price she was quoted. The man who waited on us became immediately infuriated and insisted he had straightened out the matter the second time my friend called. She then said she would go get another check. She still claimed that he had quoted her the lesser amount.

This sent the man into a rage, and he told her: "You fucked up lady!" She replied politely that she could get another check. He then said, "I don't need assholes like you." I then took my friend my the arm, who was almost in tears, and said, "Let's get the hell out of here we don't have to take this."

The man then turned to me and said, "You get the hell out of here before I have you thrown out!" My friend who does not understand people like that tried to reason with him. He then said, "It's assholes like you that fuck this place up!" I was so mad I just took my friend by the arm and said "Come on let's go to 'C and C'." He then said to me, "If you don't leave right now, I'll bounce you out on your ass myself!"

I then dragged my friend out.

With this kind of display I was not too surprised to hear of this latest incident at Russell's.

I have never gone into Russell's since then and I urge others to do the same.

Moral extremists cloudy factor

Elved Owens

A full page-ad appeared in last Sunday's New York Times paid for by the National Abortion Rights Action League, asking for support against what are called "...small, well-financed groups," who are working to make abortion illegal. The ad goes on to say that these groups "...are aggressively fighting for the government to prohibit abortion even if the woman would die or be seriously harmed by childbirth...even if the woman would have a child with severe birth defects...even if the woman were a victim of rape or incest...even though millions of unwanted children are abused physically or psychologically during childhood."

Abortion can be made illegal but it will never stop happening; this being so it is better that the most justifiable abortions should occur legally, competently and humanely. Few illicit trades are quite as despicable as that of the back-street abortionist. But to legalize abortion is not to ignore the circumstances which are alleged to make an abortion necessary. "Abortion is a difficult and agonizing decision," the NARAL rightly says, adding: "But it must be an individual choice."

Must it, or should it be an individual choice? I'm not so sure.

Unwanted pregnancies are not always inevitable, although the reality is that there is still much ignorance about contraception, and many women must cope with men who, through ignorance or stupidity, will not co-operate in birth control. Thus abortion is the ultimate way of giving choice to women who previously, perhaps through no fault of their own, were denied it. But the need for an abortion should be clear and convincing; such a serious undertaking should never simply be a matter of convenience, even though the woman may be blameless, and have to endure some hardship if an abortion does not occur.

Let's look at the list above: where a woman would die or be harmed by childbirth it seems clear to me that her right to life takes precedence over that of the foetus. An abortion would be justifiable. If the child seems likely to be born with severe defects? Personally I do not consider this sufficient grounds for abortion; that to take the life of such a child might be doing it a kindness is irrelevent. Similarly I do not believe that the child born of rape or incest should be aborted, although obviously the mother should have the option of relinquishing her technical responsibility.

That no child can be guaranteed happiness does not confer any special right on anyone to dispose of a foetus. All that can be judged in most cases is the woman's own circumstances, and whether it would be better for her if she underwent an abortion. But one does not have to be against abortion to recognize that the foetus also has rights, and a humane and cautious balance must be struck between the rights and needs of the mother and those of the imminent individual she carries within her.

The absolutists on both sides of the abortion issue worry me. To say that abortion is never justifiable because in all circumstances killing is wrong, is morally short-sighted; and to say that abortion is always justifiable because the individual woman's choice is all that matters, is also morally short-sighted.

The only constant factor is that abortion is always a tragedy. Often, in my opinion it is a justifiable one. But I don't see how it is a right, nor can I find any philosophical grounds for calling it such.

On that point at least I and the NARAL must agree to differ.

Halloween: a horror show

To the Editor:

I've never written to a publication and my writing ability may not be the best, but maybe you can still see my point.

This campus is a mess.

This past weekend left it as though a tornado dumped the contents of the town dump upon our campus center. This morning on my 10-minute walk to class, I saw at least a dozen workers picking up bottles, cans and paper that our fellow classmates left behind this weekend.

I even saw one worker picking up the endless array of glass particles, one by one. Imagine the time involved?

If we could only allocate the funds used for cleaning up thoughtless students' garbage toward sufficient lighting on campus, I believe that no one could find a shadow on the entire UMass campus.

Collegian comics 'rude, humorless'

To the Editor:

We agree with a recent letter printed in this column regarding the so-called humor of the Collegian's comics (with the exception of Doonesbury).

In our opinion they are humorless, rude, and rather distasteful, if not sick. As the young minds of our budding cartoonists lack creativity enough to be considered real cartoonists, we wish they would keep their sick humor to themselves.

Cartoons like "Norma B's" about first sexual encounters; "Beasts" about being raped, and others which must rely on letters to the editor for their material, don't deserve the ink they're printed in!!

Halloween vandalism leaves mare badly hurt at Tillson Farm

By SALLY MORGAN
Collegian Staff

In a Halloween weekend incident, several persons apparently entered a Tillson Farm barn Friday night, severely injuring a mare, Tillson worker Paula Haven said yesterday.

Haven, who discovered the injured mare at 8 a.m. Saturday, said she contacted UMass police hours later after the animal had been treated. Police last night could not confirm they had been contacted.

Haven and Animal Science Prof. Dr. Anthony Borton, who later learned of the incident, speculated that persons entered the barn Friday night, scaring some of the animals and causing the mare to jump from its stall and fall to a concrete floor below.

After the fall, Haven said, the mare apparently crashed through the bar doors to escape. Haven said she had checked the barn at 1:30 a.m. Saturday and found everything intact, but discovered the mare "standing in its own blood" seven hours later.

Borton said he believed a group of "pranksters" scared the horse because he later found several beer bottles in the barn. Haven found the horse alert, but in extreme pain."

Bush, Kennedy win straw poll

By JIM MORAN
Collegian Staff

Former CIA Director and United Nations Ambassador George Bush, a Republican, and Massachusetts Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, a Democrat, each won early presidential preference contests in their respective political parties in a straw poll held on the Amherst Common Saturday.

Bush captured 29 percent of the total 63 votes cast in the Amherst Republican Committee's straw poll. His nearest rival was Tennessee Sen. Howard Baker, who finished with 16 percent of the total votes cast.

President Jimmy Carter trailed Kennedy by 49 percent, collecting only 47 of the total 334 votes cast. Kennedy took 63 percent receiving 209 of all votes cast.

After the results, spokespersons from both of the town's political committees were contacted for comments. Amherst Democratic Committee Chairman Jerome Mileur said, "In no sense was the poll a scientific sample." Because of this, Mileur concluded, "What it means is hard to say."

Mileur said he was not suprised at Kennedy's strong showing, nor at California Gov. Jerry Brown's third place place showing. Mileur added that some of the "others" lace showing. Mileur added that some of the "others" receiving votes in the poll were Cong. Morris Udall, D-Ariz., former New York Congresswoman Bella Abzug, Sen. Henry Jackson, D-Wash., and Mickey Mouse.

"Mickey's always good for one vote," jested Mileur.

Alex Culbertson, of the Amherst Republican Committee, speculating on Bush's victory, said, "Maybe Ronald Reagan is perceived as too old, and John Connally as too boisterous — I don't know."

Blood drive seeks donors on campus

Registration for the annual UMass blood drive, scheduled for Nov. 6,7 and 8, began yesterday and continues through Thursday in the Campus Center Concourse from 10 a.m. to 3:30 p.m. Organizers of the drive urged donors to register, although walk-ins are welcome.

Hours for the drive are Tuesday, 10 a.m. to 4 p.m. and Wednesday and Thursday, 9:30 a.m. to 3:30 p.m., in the Student Union Ballroom.

The drive is a cooperative effort by Gamma Sigma Sigma and Alpha Phi Omega, two student service groups. Amherst Senior Citizens, who will be helping with food, and University Women, a group of Umass employees and wives of University employees.

ARE YOU BEING ROBBED? FIGHT BACK!

Dear Tenant.

Join us in the fight to get back your security deposit. The Umass Off Campus Housing Office, The UMass Legal Services Office and the Consumer Action Center have formed a Security Deposit Task Force in order to furnish the State Attorney General's office with information which could lead to an investigation of landlords for improperly withholding/deducting monies from your security deposit for alleged repairs, damages and/or cleaning. Rather than the landlord evaluating each unit separately, and charging tenants as such. We have included a list of pre-standardized deductions at the right.

Each of us in our separate agencies have been compiling complaints from tenants against former landlords and now think it is time to hear from others. Please fill out the questionnaire at the bottom of the page and mail it back to us by November 1, 1979. You can drop the questionnaire off in person at any of the appropriate agencies cooperating in this effort. If you have any questions do not hesitate to contact us by telephone.

Insuring the safe return of your security deposit monies is a priority for us. Help us to do something about it. Please fill out the questionnaire at the following locations:

Stickwomen fall to Dartmouth

By LINDA REYER
Collegian Staff

Dartmouth's forward Linda Jackson scored a goal assisted by Carol Krensky during the last six minutes of the first half and that was all the Big Green needed to down the stickers yesterday on NOPE field.

Although the stickers were shutout 1-0, they outshot Dartmouth twenty-four to seven.

Dartmouth's goal keeper Claire Johnson had a few key saves that kept the stickers off the scoreboard. One such save occured in the first half when Johnson used her glove to block Laura O'Neil's shot on goal forcing the ball to land on top of the net.

The sticker's offense lacked complete passing through most of the game. "We couldn't connect; they hit and ran and then we hit and ran," said UMass coach Pam Hixon. "They outplayed us. They forced us to play their kind of game."

Dartmouth coach Mary Corrigan, ecstatic about the win, said, "UMass had the best of play in the first half. Our score gave us a lot of confidence and threw them off a lot."

The loss brings the UMass record to 12-2. The Regional seedings come out this Sunday. "I don't know where we will be seeded," said Hixon.

The stickers travel to Brown University on Halloween to take on the Bruins.

Netwomen bow to UNH, come back to beat URI

By DAVE SIVRET
Collegian Staff

This past weekend, the womens tennis team played in a similar manner to the weather that we have been having of late. Hot one day, cold the next. On Friday they dropped a match to UNH but came back on Saturday and defeated URI. The one and one split was harmonious with their season's percentage of .500 with a 6-6 record.

Against UNH, the cold match, the netwomen ran into a problem that has plaged the squad all year; they seem to fold in the tough matches and not play up to their capabilities. In the UNH match they dropped three matches in the third set that proved very costly in a 6-3 loss that was played in some rather poor weather at UNH. "It often seems as though the other team rises to the occasion and we let them take the match right out of our hands," stated a disgruntled coach John Beal.

The winners for the Minutewomen were Barbara Mills and Chris Carson in singles play and the doubles team of Beth Goldberg and Fran Troy.

After playing poorly in the UNH match the netwomen had to face a good URI team the following day at home. This time they turned things around completely and played a good tough match and soundly defeated the women from Rhode Island by the score of 6-3.

In this match they did everything they failed to do versus UNH.

With the score tied at two apiece, the Minutewomen took charge and put the match away by winning four of the five remaining matches. The key match of the day was the doubles team of Liz Case and Sue Donovan coming from behind to take the third set of their match and give the Minutewomen a two-match lead at 4-2.

The victors in the URI match were captain Joanne Vennochi (6-3, 6-3), Sally Fryberger (6-1, 6-4), and Chris Carson (1-6, 6-3, 6-2) in singles. The doubles teams of Fran Troy and Beth Goldberg (6-2, 7-6-5-0 tie-breaker), Beth Noble and Carollyn Tarbell (4-6, 6-3, 6-2), and Liz Case and Sue Donovan (6-7, 7-6, 6-2) also won for UMass.

So long, Say Hey

Item: Commissioner orders Willie Mays to "disassociate" himself from baseball.

Bowie Kuhn has all the tact of a falling safe. Kuhn, in a fit of pomposity and/or stupidity, take your pick, issued this proclamation because of Willie's connection with a New Jersey casino. It would be too much for the commissioner to simply state what he meant and still means, that Mays cannot hold a paying job with a major league franchise. Kuhn, however, being the legal Garbanze bean had to use Supreme Court-speak to muddle the whole thing into oblivion.

Sure Willie can still go to OldTimer's games, Hall of Fame Inductions, and Little League dinners. There will be no revisionism of Pepsi and Schaefer Circle of Sports commercials, and no purge of Willie Mays baseball cards. The sky isn't falling.

Regardless, however, of Kuhn's handling of the matter, this may have been one of the few cases in his infamous commionership where Kuhn is right in principle, even if he doesn't know how to say it. The office of Commissioner of Baseball was created expressly as the result of the fixing of the 1919 World Series, and designed as a watchdog to keep the rot of gambling out of the game.

Now that gambling on professional sports is legal in some states, baseball cannot allow itself to be connected and contaminated by this nefarious activity. The sport can tolerate arrogance, stupidity, egomania, or even Howard Cosell. But it cannot allow itself to fall into the state that college basketball was in during the '50s or profesional wrestling. It just doesn't fly.

Item: Former Indiana Pacer signs with Women's League

When the New Jersy Gems of the

Women's Basketball League open their season in a little while, Ann Meyers will be starting at guard. Remember Ann Meyers? She was the former UCLA star drafted and signed by the Indiana Pacers of the NBA. Wow, everyone said, a woman signed by a major league sport. Pretty soon they'll start having swingpersons and sixth persons off the bench.

Great. So the Pacers sign this woman and she is never heard from again. As long as crap like this goes on women's sports will continue to be thought of as a fifth-grade fart joke. Fortunately this institution of higher learning fields one of the best women's hoop teams around so anyone with two good eyes and a fairly connected thought process can see that the women play just as tough, hard, and exciting ball as the men.

The only difference is that most male hoopsters are bigger than most female hoopsters. This really doesn't matter until Meyers has to drive against Bob Lanier. Personslaughter, as Dick Young of the New York Daily News called it.

Ann Meyers is not a Pacer, as everyone (including the jerks who signed her) knew. Now, every beer-bellied fatso who couldn't last twenty seconds against any woman athlete actually believes his idiotic notions that women athletes are silly and ninth-rate and still wear little plaid skirts on the court.

Item: White becomes free-agent.

If you ever need a reason to hate the Yankees, wait until after the upcoming free-agent draft. Roy White has declared himself a free agent, and if the New Yorkers don't re-sign him, well, the other one-third of New York that still likes the Yankees will, en masse, tell their team to go to hell.

Roy White has been the class of the Bronx Bombers since 1965, through the Jerome Ave. pipsqueak days to the present era of Reg-gie. Throughout it all, he has done nothing more than give the Yankee his best. The only honorarium the team ever gave to him was to change his number from 48 to 6, and that was when CBS owned the team.

So what kind of respect do the Yankees return? Sure they'll give multi-million dollar contracts to Goose Gossage, Reggie Jax, even Rawlings Eastwick III, or evn create positions for Tommy John or Looie Tiant afte they retire. But what is there for Roy White?

Earlier this year, during the Yankees' nightmare season, White asked to be traded. He had had it up to his proverbial nuts with Steinbrenner. The next time White came to bat at Yankee Stadium he received a five-minute standing ovation from a crowd that has been known to throw smoke bombs and pelt Reggie Jackson with Reggie Bars.

With the recent version of the Yankees looking like a Coney Island frwak show, they should be honored to have a man like Roy White wearing the pinstripes.

Naw, says Steinbrenner.

Women run short

With their top five runners not competing, the UMass Minutewomen suffered losses to UNH 32-100, UVM 33-100, and URI 64-100 last Friday on UNH's home course. The Minutewomen's top five bypassed the meet in order to save their best performances for the Easterns held next Saturday at Penn. State.

The Minutewomen who competed Friday ran some of their best times ever over the 3.1 mile course. First for the UMass women was senior 'Dill' Wilson, 16th, who ran a season best of 19:06. Finishing second for the Minutewomen was Cindy Martin, 19th, who ran her best time by 35 seconds with 19:22. Martin is normally a half-miler for UMass track and this was her first race of the season. Barb Callanan, 20th, Carol Rasmussen, 21st, and Caroline Gardner, 25th, were the remaining UMass scorers. Both Rasmussen and Gardner ran their best times by over 30 seconds.

"I'm happy it turned out the way it did. The course was very dangerous because of the roots that had been covered by leaves. A UNH runner and Barb Callanan twisted their ankles. By not running our top five we've kept them healthy," Coach Pete Pfitzinger said.

Pfitzinger and the team decided to save the best runners for the Easterns on November 3. The top five, who led the team to the New England Championship on October 20, are preparing for the Easterns with more speed workouts. Seven Minutewomen including Judy McCrone, Cathy Petrick, Julie Burke, Tricia Moores, Linda Welzel, Robyn Dally and one runner yet to be chosen will travel to Penn. State.

Men finish third

COLLEGE PARK, Penn. — In their most impressive display of running all season, the men's cross country team place third at the four-team Penn State Invitational held yesterday afternoon.

Penn State, the number one team in the east, fourth in the country last year, and one of the top six this year, easily won the event with a perfect score of 15 points, placing men in the top five spots. Larry Mangan of the Niftany Lions won the 5.2 mile event with a time of 24:40, breaking the old course record by 17 seconds.

Minutemen harrier Paul Beaulieu placed first for UMass, finishing in the twelfth spot overall with a time of 26:03. It was Beaulieu's best performance on the season. Team captain Rick Walls and junior Mike Doiron, also turned in excellent races with Walls finishing tied for 16th with the time of 26:12 respectively.

Finishing in the fourth and fifth spot for the Minutemen were senior Steve MacDougall and junior Kevin Molteni in 21st and 23rd place with times of 26:31 and 26:34 respectively.

Overall, the finishing order was Penn State 15, Rutgers 75, UMass 89, and West Virginia 114. "They ran their best race of the year," said Minutemen coach Ken O'Brien. "I was very pleased, this wasn't an unusual performance for us, it's just what we shopuld be doing. We blew out West Virginia, who beat us at the Eastern Eight meet, and after the race we still felt good."

This was a must situation for the Minutemen who will be racing a week from this Saturday at Franklin Park, Boston, at the qualifying meet for the Nationals. The three winning teams from New England will then travel to Lehigh, PA to race in the Nationals.

Although originally 10 teams were scheduled to participate in the first running of the invitational, only four teams were able to. This meet was designed to replace the ICAA's which UMass is no longer able to participate in due to their leaving of the ECAC, the same held true for the other teams participating in the event.

The women's volleyball team takes to the highway again, as they travel to the University of Hartford tonight for a tri-match against Hartford and Eastern Connecticut.

Now with a record of 14-6, UMass is coming off a tough loss against Southern Conn. last Saturday. However, according to coach Elaine Marasco, the team is ready for tonight's matches.

Last year, UMass swept both squads: the Minutewomen overwhelmed Eastern 15-6, 15-1, and fought off Hartford in three games.

After Hartford, UMass heads to Smith College for a Thursday night match.

In JV action, UMass upped its record to 3-1 last Thursday night, as they got by Mount Holyoke 15-12, 12-15, 15-8, 15-6. Good serving and passing to the frontcourt helped the Minutewomen overcome a pesky Lyon squad.

The JV's next game is Wednesday night, when tney host Northeastern at NOPE gym. Game time is 7:00 p.m.

Watson a free agent

BOSTON (AP) —Slugger Bob Watson declared himself a free agent yesterday but the Boston Red Sox said they still hope to sign the big first baseman to a new contract.

Watson came to Boston in a midseason trade with the Houston Astros for a pair of minor league pitchers and cash, then hit .337 with 13 home runs and 53 RBI in 84 games.

The 33-year-old Watson, who had played his entire career with Houston until the June 13 trade, had been negotiating with the Red Sox and had expressed a desire to return to Boston.

The Red Sox received word from the office of Baseball Commissioner Bowie Kuhn that Watson, faced with a Monday deadline for settling his status, decided to test the open market.

Minor program due in spring

By CAROLYN MOONEY
Collegian Staff

UMass students may be able to declare an officially recognized minor for the first time next spring, Harry Schumer, chairman of the Faculty Senate Academic Matters Council, said yesterday.

"In all probability the optional minors program will be approved through the regular channels by January," Schumer said, adding that students would be able to choose a minor during course selection week for the Fall 1980 semester.

So far, only the English, physics and German departments have pushed their programs through the proper curriculum committee for consideration by the Academic Matters Council, Schumer said. But he said minors programs from other departments will be coming in all year for further approval.

The proposal for the optional undergraduate minors program was first presented to the Faculty Senate by the Academic Matters Council last March, said Marita Perlak of the Provost's Office. It was developed by faculty members with the help of the Student Senate Academic Affairs Committee.

The Board of Trustees approved the proposal in June, clearing the way for individual departments to draw up their own guidelines for a minors program if they chcose to.

Although requirements for a minor may differ between departments, the proposed program calls for a minimum of 15 credits. Each department must present its program proposal to its school or college curriculum committee and dean for approval.

Once approved within the school, each program is sent to the Academic Matters Council for passage, and finally to the entire Faculty Senate. The procedure is the same used to approve any new University course, Schumer said.

English Department Head John Clayton said he expected the Faculty Senate to pass the three programs already drawn up "within two to three weeks" and "without any problem." He also said other departments within College of Arts and Sciences would have no trouble getting minors programs approved by the CAS curriculum committe.

The School of Business Administration had decided not to participate, said Joan

State justice wants law education program

By CAROL MORTON
Collegian Staff

Massachusetts needs a statewide program to teach the basic principles of law in every high school, State Supreme Court Chief Justice Edward Hennessey told a capacity Campus Center audience yesterday.

Hennessey was the keynote speaker at the fourth annual "Teaching About Law" conference, sponsored by the Massachusetts Association for Law-Related Education. Association members include teachers, lawyers, judges and others interested in promoting legal education.

"It is a mystery why we don't have a law-related education program now," Hennessey said. "Students are interested in becoming aware of how law affects their environment."

Possible results of such a program would be more widespread understanding of the law, Hennessey said, which would lead to increased respect for it and decreased crime among some people.

"It would be difficult to trace such a cause and effect relationship," the chief justice conceded after his speech, "but I have no doubt that it would exist."

Money is the reason we do not have law education program now, Hennessey said. "It would be a magnificant way to spend a moderate sum of money," he asserted.

Outlining other reasons for the proposed program, Hennessey pointed to the U.S. Constitution, saying students must have a basic understanding of individual rights granted in the Bill of Rights. "While protecting people against the increasing amount of crime, we must continue to protect individual rights and freedoms," he stated.

Hennessey described the murder of a college student, in which the public believed that the arrested suspects were guilty before they were even tried. "We should be disturbed because this indicates a lack of understanding of the basic principle that a defendant is presumed to be innocent until proven guilty."

Carter panel calls for nuke changes

By H. JOSEF HEBERT
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The presidential commission on Three Mile Island yesterday called for "fundamental changes" in the way nuclear plants are built, operated and regulated, but said adoption of its recommendations still would not "assure the safety of nuclear power."

The commission told President Carter that a broad range of deficiencies — from licensing and regulating atomic plants to the training of operators — made an atomic accident such as the one at Three Mile Island "eventually inevitable."

The panel called last March's accident the worst to occur at a U.S. commercial nuclear reactor, but said health effects probably were limited to "severe mental stress" to area residents.

Radiation released was so minor that it may never be possible to detect whether the March 28 accident near Harrisburg, Pa., will caused additional cases of cancer among those who live near the facility, the commission said.

The 12-member panel's findings are advisory and many of its recommendations, including a proposal that the Nuclear Regulatory Commission be abolished, would take congressional approval.

In accepting the report, Carter said the recommendations "will be studied very carefully" and that after an analysis he will make a report to Congress and the nation.

But he said, "Our own assessment and our decisions on what to do cannot be made immediately, and we'll have to be very careful and very methodical in our recommendations to the public."

However, members of the commission, at a news conference, voiced fears of another serious accident unless there is fast action.

"I have this terrible feeling that somewhere out there is another accident waiting to happen," said Carolyn Lewis, one of the panel's strongest critics of the nuclear industry.

Theodore Taylor, a nuclear engineer, said, "we're going through a period of risks" until the recommendations are implemented.

Commission Chairman John G. Kemeny and Arizona Gov. Bruce Babbitt expressed the panel's serious concerns about the NRC. "No one is running that particular agency," Kemeny declared. "We even have some doubt they are very clear what their mission is.

Babbit called the NRC "a headless agency" that "lacks the sense, direction, the vitality that is necessary to administer safety consideration on a dayto-day basis."

Woman chosen education secy

WASHINGTON (AP) — President Carter chose Shirley M. Hufstedler, a federal appeals court judge, to be the nation's first secretary of education, but held out the possibility yesterday that she may be named to the Supreme Court if a vacancy occurs there.

The president described Mrs. Hufstedler, 54, as "one of the best minds in the country," and as someone "who could take a new fresh look at the way we educate our children."

Carter's decision was reached Monday after he met the California jurist for the first time. Deputy White House press secretary Rex Granum said it was understood in that meeting that Mrs. Hufstedler "will not be precluded" from consideration for a high court post.

Militants attack US embassy

SAN SALVADOR, El Salvador (AP)— About 300 militant leftists attacked the U.S. Embassy yesterday, firing guns and screaming "We will take the embassy!" authorities reported.

They said U.S. Marine guards and Salvadoran troops used tear gas to repel the invaders who climbed the embassy fence but were driven back before they could force their way into the building. Two Marine were reported to have been slightly wounded.

"They surrounded the embassy building for a few minutes and they may have hurled a Molotov Cocktail on the western side of the building," said embassy spokesman Vitas Dambrava.

In Washington, State Department officials said one Marine guard was wounded slightly when a bullet grazed his ear. They said the Marine probably was saved by his helmet. No details were given about the second injured Marine, but officials said his wound was not serious.

US arms rushed to SE Asia

SINGAPORE (AP) — U.S. Assistant Secretary of State Richard Holbrooke said yesterday that more U.S. military hardware is being rushed to Thailand, Malaysia and the Philippines to strengthen the armies of those countries.

In Prague, meanwhile, Vietnam's defense chief was quoted in a Czechoslovak newspaper as saying the United States and China are arming unidentified forces for an attack on Cambodia.

Holbrooke told a news conference here that the United States was again getting involved in Southeast Asia by supporting the Association of Southeast Asian Nations — Singapore, Malaysia, Indonesia, Thailand and the Philippines — known as ASEAN.

Asked whether Vietnam would invade Thailand, he said "the Vietnamese have stated that they would not. We attach great importance to that statement."

UMass drinkers surveyed to determine tolerance

By JEFF BAKER
Collegian Staff

In the next few weeks, approximately one of every sixteen UMass students will receive a seven-page questionairre on their drinking habits.

The consumer survey is distributed by the Alcohol Education Project, a federally funded program whose goal is to promote responsible use of alcohol on campuses.

The purpose of the questionairre is "to give creedance to our assumptions concerning alcohol use on campus," according to E.T. Mellor, workshop coordinator for the project. Mellor said the survey had been invaluable in helping staff members "get more insight into who we're dealing with."

Mellor cited examples of the survey "targeting specifically who the problem drinker is on campus." With this information, workshops can be designed to help these people, he said.

Another function of the survey is to "show results," said Bernie Jaworski, the staff member in charge of distributing and analyzing the survey. Jaworski explained the program is in the final year of a five-year federal grant and results of the survey will be made available to the government and other universities participating in the program. Some of the data has been presented in academic journals, Jaworski noted.

Both Mellor and Jaworski stressed the confidential nature of the survey. Jaworski said despite a number on each survey for coding purposes, no record of individual replies is kept. He said the response rate is lower than in past years, with between 30-40 percent of the surveys returned.

Mellor went on to explain the function of the Alcohol Education Project. He said the project provides workshops on fourteen different aspects of alcohol and drug use to Heads of Residence and Cluster Residential Assistants on an "as requested" basis.

The project peer educators will speak to "around 3,000" students during the school year. Mellor termed the workshops "very successful" in part because of what he called the "ripple effect." He said the workshops reach a small percentage of students in each dorm, who then tell others in their dorm what they have learned.

Mellor mentioned another example of how the survey had helped him conduct the workshops. At the beginning of the program, Mellor assumed that most students attending the workshops were non- or light drinkers.

However, survey and workshop results showed that those attending the workshops represented " a definite cross section or middle group" of UMass student drinkers. This finding helped the project change its focus toward the entire student body, Mellor said.

Russell denies customer charges

By BRIAN O'CONNELL
Collegian Staff

As three area women face criminal charges stemming from an incident at Russell's Liquor store in Amherst last month store owner William Russell has denied charges of physical and verbal harassment on the part of store employees.

Russell's denial followed two letters written to the Collegian yesterday by area residents claiming they witnessed customers being physically and verbally threatened by store employees within the past year.

Refuting charges that store employees have harassed store customers "at any time," Russell added, "Nobody in this store is picking on anybody, although sometimes we have to police ourselves."

Russell also said he "wasn't sure how other (package) stores operate, but we watch customer's I.D.'s very carefully, for our own protection, and for the protection of our customers.

"If I spend all my time looking for trouble, I wouldn't be in this business," he said.

Russell had previously denied charges made by the Amherst Defense Committee that three area women were attacked in his store by Amherst police earlier this semester.

The three women involved, Ada Griffin, a Hampshire College student, Gina Stevens, an Amherst College student, and Sheila Johnson, a librarian at Amherst College, will be tried on Nov. 21 at Hampshire County District Court in Northampton on charges of disorderly conduct, stemming from the Russell's incident. According to Amherst College President Julian Gibbs, legal fees for the three defendants will be paid for by Amherst College.

In a press release issued by the Amherst Defense Committee, the committee claimed the three defendants "were attacked and physically brutalized by four Amherst Police officers...while making a purchase at Russell's Liquor store on September 29." Defendant Griffin said that she had not given her version of the Russell's incident to anyone on the Committee.

The Amherst Defense Committee could not be reached for comment.

Harassment suit against QR expanded

By DEBBIE WALLACE
Collegian Staff

Two UMass students have expanded their civil suit against the Quonset Disco in Hadley and two alleged bouncers to increase claims from $40,000 to $210,000 each, while assistant manager, Hazel Cunningham, is angry over the subsequent loss of business.

Bruce Goodchild, 30, and Byron Canney, 31, both UMass students, claim they were physically and verbally harassed by alleged bouncers Sean Kinneen and Matthew Sunter of Amherst in an amended claim made Oct. 22.

However, Cunningham said the disco does not employ bouncers on Wednesday nights because it offers disco lessons with an open disco afterward, and business is slow. Cunningham said she knows only one of the five alleged bouncers, whom she said was a former employee. She said the alleged bouncers were "not employed by the disco. Anybody can check our payroll."

People's Gay Alliance members claim that on four consecutive Wednesday nights beginning March 27, they were not allowed to dance together at the disco.

Owner Henry Kurzdlowski said his entertainment license prohibits "improper dancing" by patrons. "Men dancing together is all right," he said. The first two times men danced together nothing happened, he said, but the third time, "one guy dropped his pants, and other men were kissing on the side of the neck and cuddling. That's not proper for a dance floor."

Goodchild and Canney, along with two other men, "John Doe' and "Richard Roe," who filed the suit under pseudonymns to avoid family and peer pressure, were assaulted by the bouncers without justification, they said, and the management did not try to stop them.

Each of the original plantiffs, Goodchild and Canney, is suing the disco and the two bouncers separately for $10,000 on each of seven claims, resulting in a total claim of $210,000 each.

However, Cummingham insisted, "There was no fight at any time. The police were mad when they arrived on April 4. At least five squad responded to the call. They assumed that I made the call. But there wasn't one blow thrown; it was embarassing for all of the crusiers."

Kurzydlowski said his lawyer does not even want to bother with the suit. "Business at the disco was badly hurt by the publicity, he said. "We had to close the disco on Wednesday nights and discontinue the disco lessons. Somebody ought to be responsible. If somebody was injured, that would be a different story." He added he had heard nothing from Goodchild and Canney until Oct. 2, "when we were slapped with a law suit."

SGA activities: debate continues on student money

Editor's note: This is the first of a bi-weekly column detailing the activities of the Student Government Association.

By ED LEVINE
Collegian Staff

Leaders of the Student Government Association said yesterday they were encouraged by a negotiation session with UMass vice president Bernice Braden last Friday.

Braden met with SGA officials in an attempt to settle a dispute between student leaders and the University administration over the control of student activities funds.

SGA Co-President and student trustee Rich LaVoice said Braden agreed to allow the SGA to submit proposed revisions to the trustees' program statement, which budgets monies from the Student Activities Trust Fund. The SATF, the $84 fee which each undergraduate is required to pay yearly, has normally been allocated by the Student Senate, LaVoice said, and he challenged the trustees' allocation of these funds.

LaVoice said he plans to delete all references to exact dollar figures in the trustees' program statement. "No other program statements set dollar amounts," he said.

The revisions will be submitted to Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs Dennis L. Madson November 5, and will eventually be submitted to the trustees for final action.

Co-op Dispute

In another meeting last week with Vice Chancellor for Adminstration and Finance George Beatty, SGA Co-director of Communications Joel Weissman said Beatty had agreed to rescind his order, barring the Union Video Center from conducting business with University departments.

Beatty's verbal mandate of the University Procurement Office last week barred University departments from dealing with student-run businesses. Weissman said Beatty had cancelled the planned rental of equipment from UVC by the Continuing Education Division.

English prof picks art proposals

By STEVEN SEMPLE
Collegian Staff

UMass English Professor Bernard Bell will be in Washington D.C. tomorrow, helping to evaluate project proposals for the National Endowment for the Humanities.

The organization is a clearinghouse for the humanities which allocates state and federal funds and matches private contributions.

Bell was appointed to the six-man panel by virtue of his expertise in the studies of American culture, with a special focus on Afro-American interests. He sees his appointment as an opportunity to fulfill his obligation to his profession and the interests of blacks and other minorities.

"It is a stimulating and enriching experience to participate in the process of evaluating grant proposals for the nation," Bell said. "It is an honor to be chosen."

The proposals cover such topics as literary and language research and are designed to stimulate new research and advance scholarship in the humanities, Bell said.

The panel considers many aspects of the proposals, including the qualifications of the coordinator and the amount of funds requested. It also hears comments from specialists in the field. The recommendations of the panel go to the national board and then to the director of the program. Bell said that, in most cases, the panel's recommendations are accepted.

Zimbwabwe's own "Maonei"

By TERRELL EVANS
Black Affairs Staff

"When I came to UMass I was not on a scholarship and I wasn't supposed to work, so a way for me to make some income was to sell clothes I had made by hand," said Maonei Bwerinofa, an African student from Zimbwabwe.

Many of you who have walked through the campus center concourse have undoubtably taken a few minutes to admire the handiwork and creative genius of Maonei. She has been in the United States for four years attending Greenfield Community College at first and then coming to UMass in 1977 to finish her work in public health.

"I started putting things out and would put a few things at first, many of friends told me that my prices were too low for the handmade clothes. I saw that I could make something selling the clothes so I made a lot more items and people bought them and still do," Maonei said.

Maonei came to the United States at urgence of the same family that her brother had lived with when he came here in 1965.

"This family had been writing me letters since I was ten years old. I wasn't much interested in coming to the United States but Mr. and Mrs. Rugg asked me to in their letters. I really wanted to see them because I had been writing to someone I had never seen," she said.

"I wanted to see what they were like and what type of life they lived," Maonei said. The family lives in Greenfield. "My brother attended Clark University and came to UMass to get his masters in Geology," she said.

"My brother is in Canada now, but I want to go back to Zimbwabwe. It would be difficult for me to go back because of the war. My parents advise me to stay here because it is really hard to travel in and out of the country now," she said.

Her father also writes to her that there are a lot of people who want her to come back and help out. Her education in health is much more needed in Zimbwabwe. Maonei lives near a town called Fort Victoria and says she doesn't like living in the United States that much.

"For a student the United States is alright, but I wouldn't want to live here. I have found working here and talking to many people that a lot of them here need to know more about Africa. They have asked me all types of questions like, did I learn to speak English in a tree?" Maonei said.

There are a lot of South African students up here. I have friends form Algeria, Nigeria, Mali, Kenya, Ghana and people from all over Africa," she said.

Maonei sells baby clothes for babies of all ages, dashikis, skull caps, hats, mittens, scarves, afghans, pot holders, shirts and sweaters. She is on the concourse every Friday at 9 a.m.

Does anybody remember any university pride?

To the Editor

As I approached my office in the Campus Center this morning, I was appalled by the debris littering the main campus, apparently the aftermath of the weekend's festivities. I subsequently learned that the Southwest area, especially in the vicinity of the Hampden Commons, was in even worse condition.

I have been associated with large universities long enough to realize that a certain amount of trashing is inevitable following a weekend revelry. Nevertheless, what greeted me this morning was matched only, in my experience, by the devastation wrought on the Madison campus of the University of Wisconsin in 1970 when the Governor called out the National Guard to quell anti-war demonstrations; the only thing missing was the lingering odor of tear gas. Since Hallowe'en is only a minor holiday, I shudder to imagine what will occur during a major event.

Many university communities take pride in their campuses. I sincerely hope we can gain the equanimity and moderation necessary to prevent a repetition of last weekend's dreadful excesses.

An 18-year-old's view of the residents of UMass

To the Editor

It has come to my attention that the University of Massachusetts is filled with immature acting students. I am a resident of Southwest and I am under the age of 18. I live with my parent. I have seen in the time I have been here that students are not educated in how to act with good manners.

The minority of upperclassmen that are very immature, are allowed to influence the majority of new underclassmen (freshmen specifically) to do whatever they like to with no thought to others. It seems to me that no one is trying to control the influence of these upperclassmen over these freshmen. For example, these last couple of years incidents have been seen where yelling matches between dorms has taken place, the language of which was the most sexist, racist, and foul I have ever heard. I was told about one incident where students went as far as throwing burning furniture out the windows of one of the towers of Southwest.

Isn't it time that these children were educated in how to act with good manners. After all isn't that what the students are here for, Education!.

The masters of the media

When you have no defense to proven facts, resort to childish name-calling. That should be the motto of the UMass Zionist Alliance (UMZA) and P. Kamens/B. Shapiro's letters of October 17, 1979. Each accused us, the Iranian Moslem Students Assoc. (IMSA) of being racist, anti-Semitic, and associated us with a neo-Nazi-white supremacist organization. IMSA presented irrefutable facts: names and pictures of the chief executives of this country's mass media. That most are Jewish, seems to upset UMZA and Kamens/Shapiro. It was not IMSA who made race an issue. IMSA has no objection to any race or group of people having interest in or holding executive positions at major and minor media businesses. So long as that property/power position is not used to oppress, exploit or mislead other people.

Masters of the Media was drawn from More magazine, a well-respected trade publication. The issues raised from this raw data are: Who are the owner of the national electronic and print media? Who are the chief executives? Is it possible that news events are excluded or presented in a highly prejudiced manner to advance or support privately held political, economic, or social topics?

Only viewers of the mass media can answer these questions, but only after reading Masters of the Media. Read, and then think about the masters of the media, judge for yourself after reading various newspapers and watching the major T.V. networks and news programming.

Mis-directed UMZA and Kamens/Shapiro displayed their skill at directing our attention away from the issues. Sorry but it didn't work. Iranians are Asian, and therefore we cannot be white-supremacists. Iran did not harbor Nazi war criminals as others did, we therefore cannot be neo-Nazi, anti-Semetic, or anti-Jewish. Iran has broken all formal and trade relations with racist South Africa's government, we therefore cannot be racists.

However, the Zionist government that illegally occupies Palestinian land has direct financial, military, and diplomatic ties with racist South Africa. That Zionist government's miniature "death industry" sells military arms to South Africa to assist in the oppression of the Black majority population. Zionist "Israel" requires proof of your mother's Jewish ancestry before full citizenship rights are given.

After removing the smoke screen, question: Who are the racists, who are the fascists, who are the ethnic supremacists? Surely not the IMSA or the Iranian people.

On October 19, 1979 Santis presented a lackluster editorial. He cites exceptions to Masters of the Media. Then tries to align Iran with anti-Jewish policies. Both attempts fall short. We should have full disclose of ownership and question what alliances will power in reporting the news. Non-Jewish newspaper chains have built-in biases as well.

Second, Santis claims Khomeini's comment about "...heaven forbid a Jews ascends to power in Iran..." as proof of Iran's racist, anti-Jewish, anti-Semitic leanings. Wrong gain-ups on wrong, since Santis fails to understand the full meaning of the statement.

According to the Iranian constitution the only requirement for participation in government is citizenship. Some Jews are Iranian citizens who can and have participation in government. However, Zionism tends to be an imperialist force in the Middle East.

Heaven forbid that that results in a Zionist Jew or non-Jew directed invasion or take over of Iran. That is the one and only meaning if one knows the facts about Iran's plight.

IMSA condemns racism, fascism, and especially imperialism and colonialism in South Africa, Rhodesia, Palestine, or any other place in the world.

Zionist occupation of Palestinian land has forced children, woman, old, and young Palestinians to live in refugee camps. That rings of Nazi concentration camps.

Who are the Masters of the Media if you do not know about the atrocities advanced by Zionists?

Iranian Moslem Student Association of UMass

Jewish race should learn

James Lewis

Why do people feel that criticizing Jews is threatening their extinction? Why all the paranoia and emotional throat grabbing? It makes no sense to me.

Why are the Jews misunderstood and persecuted, or simply questioned and criticized? I won't pretend to be an authority on the subject but I will state how it looks to me.

Jews are regarded as a race of people around the world. The covenant of Abraham and God prohibited Abraham and the seed of Abraham to mix with any other people. In their origins as a religion they were a chosen people, separate and special with God from the other people around them. Having children from women not with their tribe disqualified the children from being a part of the chosen people.

US Jews have a dual role. They are oppressed minorities as well as white racist. This dual role is their present cause of criticism from other minorities. Then it is said, people do what they want to do. Can't they simply be people, individuals believing what they want as free Americans. They are the only people presently being persecuted for their religion.

Being free Americans, they can do what they want to, but they do function as a race and when their actions run counter to basic human rights, they are criticized as well as questioned, just like every other group of people fighting for survival in this world.

Jews are still a little different. They are oppressed but they become part of the oppressor. They become white, racist in character and action, making enemies out of their former allies of oppression.

They excel in the US society and direct the national interest to direct US government foreign aid to Israel, about 5 billion per day, more than to all of Africa. Israel would not be in existence if it were not for the United States.

It is too late for Americans, and peoples of the world, not to regard Jews as a race, as opposed to a religion. Many US Jews are not religious. People think of Jews as a race. It's ingrounded into the world psyche. If a Jewish person becomes Catholic and later becomes the Pope, people will say "That's a Jewish Pope." Unfortunately this is the reality.

If Jews become white and racist, they will be criticized and questioned as a race, a group of people. The truth is, there are many Jews who do not become white and racist. Unfortunately they are a minority to the majority of Jews in the US. The prominent American stereotypes of Jews as people are lawyers, doctors, bankers and business managers. They are rarely depicted as brutally victimized by the police or recycled through 80 percent of the nation's prisons in the US.

They do live in ghettos in the US but the ghettos are not slums, but often upper-middle-class neighborhoods. Their children go to the best schools in the country, unlike other oppressed minorities, and they are able to enter into society equipped with the advantages of their environment and better able to provide for a healthy, well-rounded, typical American family.

The minority of Jews who are conscientious enough to remember their own heritage of persecution as a race and do spend their energies working for the good of mankind are to be given credit for their efforts. These people have given their share to combat the evils of society and have thus contributed to any progress and genuine happiness we know today.

In the final analysis, a person is either a part of the problem, or part of the solution, regardless of race, color, sex, age, religion, national origin or handicapped position. If you are going to be part of the problem, you've sold yourself cheap, to say the least. Because Jews are regarded as a race, they have a responsibility to their people and to their image. It's hard for me to imagine Jews attacking Jews, but the evils of society will be addressed and confronted. The movement is already in motion. I personally would advise Jews to learn about their religion, their history, their culture and their persecution.

Davenny of the SBA dean's office. "We simply don't have the space," Davenny said. "We can't even accomodate majors, courses are so tight."

Student Senate speaker David Barenberg, one of four students who sit on the faculty Academic Matters Council, said over-subscribed departments other than those under SBA may also be forced to reject a minors program, due to lack of staff. But he said he did not know which ones.

The Student Senate Academic Affairs Committee is currently working with undergraduate counsels and faculty to develop minors programs in departments which definitely want them, Barenberg said.

Weissman said Beatty had only cancelled his restriction against UVC and let stand the prohibition on all other student co-ops. He said Beatty was concerned with the tax exempt status of the co-ops and had questioned whether or not they blended into the University's concept of a tax-exempt educational institution.

LaVoice said Beatty had asked the SGA to develop a "statement of the mission and goals of student run businesses" and challenged Beatty's questioning of the educational purpose of the co-ops.

Kickers take on Westfield St.

By DAVE BRADLEY
Collegian Staff

The men's soccer team, looking to avenge a 1-0 loss that knocked them out of NCAA playoff contention last season, will host Westfield State College today at 2:30 p.m. in a game Coach Russ Kidd termed a "grudge match."

It was Westfield that doused any possible hopes the Minutemen had of an NCAA berth last year. UMass had been on the skids when they played the Owls, having lost their previous three games, but it was the division three team they play today that finally did them in.

The Minutemen are playing for pride these days. Having lost their last two games to two nationally ranked powerhouses, the University of Rhode Island (1-0) and the University of Connecticut (3-2), UMass' record dropped to 4-4-2 and all playoff hopes have died. But UMass is not ashamed of their performances against New England's best and will strive to win their remaining four games, Kidd said.

Westfield Coach James Fonte said he expects UMass to be tough, but his team will also be ready.

"They're gonna be a good team, no doubt about that," said Fonte, but he added, "We plan on showin' up."

The Owls have an 11-4-1 record which includes a 3-1 win over Plymouth State College, currently tied with UMass for the twelfth spot in the New England rankings. The Westfield offense has scored 44 goals this season, twice as many as they have allowed. Their top scorer, John Vassallo from Amherst, has 18 goals and seven assists to his credit. Vassallo scored the winning goal with 4:42 left in last year's game. Hector Gomes is Westfield's second leading gunner with nine goals and 11 assists.

Former UMass star

Flanagan wins Cy Young in AL

NEW YORK (AP) — Lefthander Mike Flanagan of the Baltimore Orioles, the winningest pitcher in the American League, was voted the AL Cy Young winner for 1979, the Baseball Writers Association of America announced yesterday.

Flanagan won 23 games for the American League champions in 1979, the most victories in the league. He lost just nine for a winning percentage of .719. His earned run average was 3.08, fourth best in the league, and he tied for the lead in shutouts with Nolan Ryan of California and Dennis Leonard of Kansas City with five apiece.

Flanagan collected 26 first-place votes of a possible 28 cast by members of the BBWAA and was second on the remaining two ballots. Tommy John of the New York Yankees was second with one first-place vote, and Ron Guidry of the Yankees was third with the remaining first-place vote. Flanagan was the only pitcher named on all 28 ballots cast by two writers in each AL city.

Under the point system which allows five points for first place, three for second and one for third, Flanagan collected 136 points. Joh, with a 21-9 record, had 51 points, and Guidry, the league's ERA champion at 2.78, was third with 26 points. Texas reliever Jim Kern was fourth with 25 points.

It was the fifth time in 11 years an Oriole has won or shared the Cy Young award, and Flanagan is the third consecutive left-hander to win the award in the AL.

Orioles right-hander Jim Palmer won the award in 1973, 1975 and 1976, and Baltimore's Mike Cuellar shared the award with Denny McLain of Detroit in 1969. New York Yankees' left-handers have won the award the previous two years — Guidry in 1978 and Sparky Lyle in 1977.

Flanagan, 27, won 13 of his last 16 starts in 1979, and he won Game One of the World Series, which the Orioles lost in seven games to the Pittsburgh Pirates. He was the loser in Game Five, and he appeared against one batter in the ninth inning of Game Seven.

The voting was conducted before the league championship playoffs.

Flanagan started 38 games this season, second in the AL only to teammate Dennis Martinez. Along with Martinez, Palmer and Scott McGregor, Flanagan was part of the American League's most potent pitching staff. The Orioles' pitchers had a team ERA of 3.28, best in the AL, with 52 complete games and 12 shutouts.

Using his fastball, curve and a new changeup, Flanagan struck out 190 batters in 1979, third to Ryan and Guidry in the league. He had 16 complete games, 2652-3 innings pitched and walked 70 batters.

Flanagan, a native of Manchester, N.H., now resides in Cockeysville, Md. He was the Orioles' seventh selection in the regular phase of the June 1973 free agent draft, and he signed with the Birds the same month. He spent four years in the Orioles' minor league system before coming up to Baltimore and Rochester in 1976, and he has been a full-time major league pitcher since 1977 when he had a 15-10 record.

JV booters down Springfield

Chris Blanchette scored a goal two minutes into the game to pace the JV soccer team over the JV's from Springfield College yesterday afternoon in Springfield.

Capitalizing on loose balls in front of the Springfield net, the Minutemen went up 2-0 on a John Brigham goal 22 minutes into the first half.

Before the half could come to a close, the Springfield squad netted the ball to cut the score to 2-1 in favor of the UMass team.

In the second half, the only score came off of the foot of UMass' Mike Jenkins, the team's leading scorer on the season, to conclude the game's scoring at 3-1.

"I'd like to commend the strong midfield play of Kevin Fowler, Dave Bernstein and Dan Rustemeyer," said winning coach Ed Nemeic. "These guys really put it together at midfield."

Women booters down Harvard in overtime, 4-3

By ROB EMMONS
Collegian Staff

The Minutewomen drew their largest home crowd of the season yesterday, and they treated the fans to the most exciting game of the schedule to date, edging Harvard in overtime, 4-3.

Though UMass scored relatively early in the game, with two goals inside the left post by the 9:05 mark, the Crimson were putting up a good fight. They narrowed the deficit midway through the period when a forward beat defender Jackie Gaw to the ball and poked it home. The score at halftime was 2-1.

Less than a minute and a half into the second period, Harvard tied it up with a direct kick that left UMass blinking. The Minutewomen took no time in regaining the lead, however, as Natalie Prosser fired a shot into the upper right hand corner from just outside the penalty area. The Crimson, undaunted, came right back themselves, jumping on a rebound off Kelley Tuller moments later.

The two teams battled scorelessly for the remainder of the period, deadlocked at 3-3 when regulation time expired. It was declared that two 10-minute overtime periods would be played, and the Minutewomen lined up in the waning daylight. Natalie Prosser outraced two Crimson backs at 7:15 of the first extra period for the only OT goal, sealing a UMass victory.

Diamond dust

Believe it or not, with everyone in the professional sports world gearing for the meat of the seasons for winter sports, there's been some baseball news made in the last few days that bears a little looking at.

First on the agenda is Bob Watson's declaration of his free-agent status. In the last half of the debacle that some people refer to as the 1979 season, Watson proved exactly what he can do to help the Boston Red Sox. Now, after having all the time in the world to work an agreement with Watson, the Sox have forced his hand and made the consistent first baseman take steps to protect himself and his family. President and general manager Haywood Sullivan is on the verge of making the same type of mistake the Sox made when they let Luis Tiant go to the Yanks by way of free-agency. Along the same line is the bone-head move of trading Bill Lee to Montreal for Stan Papi. It's a pretty good track record when you look at some of the other pitchers and players that the Sox have let slip through their fingers. Lynn McClothen (Chicago Cubs), Fregusen Jenkins (Texas), Don Aase (California), Sparky Lyle (Texas), Bernie Carbo (St. Louis), and Reggie Smith (LA) are just the tip of the iceberg. Remember, the Sox once had Babe Ruth and let him go. Let's hope they realize what they're doing with Watson before it's too late; these things have a way of coming back to haunt you.

Moving along to a bigger and more confusing mess in the baseball world let's take a look at some recent developments in baseball's new circus act, the New York Yankees. First Martin is hired, then he's fired, then he's hired again, and now Mr. Martin finds himself in the unemployment line again after beating up a marshmallow salesman from Illinois. But hold on, by the time you read this, Steinbrenner may have hired Martin again. I know of some soap opera writers who would have given their right arms to come up with a script like this.

Added to this complex scene are the overall woes of the former World Champions. No sooner does Roy White announce his free agency do the Yanks announce the signing of Bucky Dent and Jim Spencer. White's done a lot for the Yanks but they won't recognize it while nobody really wanted the other two. A classic Yankee solution to a classic Yankee problem.

Third on this list of baseball happenings is the Bowie Kuhn response to Willie Mays associating with the gambling world. You did it again Bowie. You've once again proved that you can place your foot in your mouth in one swift, but sure move. Willie Mays has done more for baseball than Kuhn will ever do; Kuhn insists on making more enemies for this idealistic game when he should be concerned with preserving it.

After all, what would Mr. Kuhn have done if Carl Yastremski had opened up a dog track in Chicopee like he wanted to? It's a dangerous precedent in pro sports. Who's going to tell Gerry Cheevers of the Bruins that he should sell his race horses? Bowie, just shut up and do your job.

Last but not least on this list is yesterday's announcing of former UMass player Mike Flanagan as the 1979 Cy Young award recipient in the American League.

Committee set to plan CC repair

By RICHARD NAGLE
Collegian Staff

BOSTON — The UMass Building Authority announced the establishment of a construction committee that will seek out expert opinions on the extent of repairs and costs of future work on the leaking Campus Center deck.

The Authority-staffed committee is the result of a closed session vote at a Building Authority meeting in Boston yesterday.

The committee was established to investigate repair priorities.

The committee was established to investigate repair priorities, according to Authority members. These include the determination of the scope and financing of such work, and it's subsequent undertaking.

The Authority also approved the appointment of Ben Gallis and Goldman Sachs as non-paid financial advisors to help direct future refinancing of Project Eleven bonding. Project Eleven is the Building Authority's designation for the Campus Center.

During the 90-minute meeting, the possibilities of either restoring the original deck or providing another roof over it were discussed. Construction Consultants, Inc. has offered two versions of the first option, both entailing the removal of current faulty roofing and replacing it with waterproof materials.

Vice-Chancellor of Administration and Finance George Beatty said the first option would raise problems of redirecting the air-flow system in the roof. Beatty instead suggested enclosing the now exposed deck. This would hopefully solve the leaking and add more floor space to the building, Beatty said.

Campus Center architect Herbert Beckhard attributed the deck problems to lack of maintenance, and construction problems. He said he considered Mr. Beatty's proposal "structurally feasible."

Campus Center architect Herbert Beckhard attributed the deck problems to lack of maintenance.

One authority member likened Beatty's suggestion to "solving a leaky cellar by adding more water to make a swimming pool."

Vice-President of Management Bernice Braden also announced the appointment of Ann Hurd as new liason between the Building Authority and the University.

Books and bricks do not a library make

By MARY ZARRILLI
Collegian Staff

So it rose and so it falls.

In the days of ancient Rome, culture meant education, education meant books, and books meant a library.

Currently, at UMass, culture still means education, education still means books—however, books no longer mean a library.

The "falling" UMass library has been scolded, laughed at, and satirized through-out the semester.

From cartoons to wandering "Halloweeners" in the guise of this comic structure, the UMass library has caused a laugh or two. It reminds us that there is a bright side to every story, a joke for every crisis:

"Administration is very powerful, you know. They can even shrink the library from 26 to two stories."

"You don't have to jump off the library to commit suicide, just walk by it."

"There is now a fifth example of Great American Know-how. Right next to the Pinto, Three Mile Island, the D.C. 10 and Sky-Lab, stands the UMass library."

"What's the similarity between the UMass library and Jimmy Carter? Both their platforms are falling."

"The UMass library could have worse problems. Horses could be trying to eat the hay."

Old jokes fade and are replaced by new ones. Yet the UMass library remains, awaiting its judgment, a constant inspiration for humor.

We have indeed changed a great deal since the days of ancient Rome.

Proposed Dayan visit vetoed by DVP

By PAMELA LINDMARK
Collegian Staff

An appearance here by former Israeli Foreign Minister Moshe Dayan, slated first in a proposed nationwide tour, was rejected yesterday by the UMass Distinquished Visitors Program, Program Chairman Joel Weissman last night said.

High expenses, unresolved security problems and time constrictions worked against the appearance, Weissman said.

"We'd have to take a substantial loss, which we can't afford to do at this time," he said. Total program costs, including a $10,000 honorarium fee, were estimated at over $14,000.

"It's not worth putting the committee into deficit for a two hour lecture," Weissman said.

Dayan, who last week resigned as Israeli foreign minister in a deep-seated dispute over West Bank settlement policies of Prime Minister Menachem Begin's government, is now scheduling a Nov. 16-Dec. 10 nationwide tour.

Program Vice-Chairman Howard Goldman, who last week announced an offer had been made to his group, yesterday said "the cost is out of our league."

Goldman said the program is allocated a yearly budget of $26,000. He said the allocation "was enough 10 years ago, but not today when $8,000 to $9,000 is charged by top speakers."

DVP, prohibited from charging the undergraduate student body admission fees, last week proposed a conjunction with the Union Program Council. Admission fees are permitted to finance the event if sponsored with the council, Goldman said.

Council co-Chair Bob Humphries said the Council was given too short notice to prepare for the event.

"It seemed financially sound if it was in a large hall," Humphries said. "It was not as much the finances as the time," he said, citing problems negotiating a security plan necessary for the event.

Goldman also said his office has received negative response from the Office of Third World Affairs, AHORA, Iranian student organizations and individual students.

"We felt it would have been detrimental to the campus to bring Dayan," he said. "There's the possibility of splitting up campus groups against one another."

Senate rejects new Atty. General

By ED LEVINE
Collegian Staff

The Undergraduate Student Senate last night rejected the appointment of Jon Hensleigh as Attorney General. This move leaves the Student Judiciary without a permanent Attorney General for at least one more week.

The appointment of Hensleigh was made by Student Government Association co-Presidents Rich LaVoice and Brian Burke, who chose Hensleigh from threee recommendations made by a student search committee.

The search committee, chaired by acting Attorney General Will Pierce, selected three applicants—Hensleigh, Ann Bolger, and Julie Robertson—from a field of 11 candidates. Pierce said the candidates were not ranked in order of preference and were offered to Burke and LaVoice as suggestions. He said the co-Presidents were free to choose any of the applicants.

LaVoice said he and Burke would have to re-submit a nomination to the Senate next week. Although he said he did not know who would be appointed, he did not rule out the possibility of re-appointing Hensleigh.

"I can't understand why the motion failed," Hensleigh said. "My intention is to re-apply and to call for another vote for confirmation, I can't see any misgivings about my character or my performance. It had to be a political move."

LaVoice called the vote "confusing" and said "old political enemies" had defeated Hensleigh's appointment. "They played politics," LaVoice said.

Hensleigh has previously served as SGA co-President with Herb Tyson and was also Attorney General at one time.

Pierce said he was surprised by the Senate's action. "They made a grave mistake in rejecting Hensleigh," he said. "His practical experience was more than enough to convince anybody. He has excellent qualifications."

Another member of the search committee, Tony Johnson, disagreed with Pierce's opinion of Hensleigh. "I didn't think he was the best qualified candidate," Johnson said. "The Senate understood that the presidents had no input on the selection of the final three candidates, so then how could they make a decision on the final one? The committee did not address the pros and cons to the presidents. I don't think my views were expressed."

Higher ed panel sworn in BOSTON (AP) — Gov. Edward J. King yesterday swore in the 10 public members of a commission newly created to evaluate public higher education in Massachusetts.

King said at ceremonies in the Senate chamber that the commission's goal "is one of improved quality in a most efficient and economical manner."

Besides the 10 public members appointed by the governor, the panel includes five members of the Senate and 10 state representatives.

General: Asians 'callous'

NORTHAMPTON (AP) — Gen. William C. Westmoreland, former commander of United States forces in Vietnam, says he still feels Asians value human life less than Westerners do and thinks the Vietnamese a "very callous people."

Westmoreland made the remarks Tuesday at Smith College when his speech was interrupted by an audience member who rose and called the retired military leader a mass murderer.

Westmoreland was asked about his comment on the value Asians allegedly attach to life that appeared in the anti-war documentary film "Hearts and Minds."

State may axe MBTA cars

BOSTON (AP) — The state is considering dealing with its trolley car problems in Boston by getting rid of its defective fleet of Light Rail Vehicles (LRVs) and buying new ones, The Associated Press has learned.

Before deciding on this or any other options, Massachusetts Bay Transportation Authority Chairman Robert Foster and Gov. Edward J. King are awaiting the report of an independent counsel retained to evaluate the LRV program and possible legal action against the manufacturer.

Thomson to run as third party

WASHINGTON (AP) — Former New Hampshire Gov. Meldrim Thomson, saying the major political parties cannot solve the nation's problems, announced yesterday he will make a third-party run for the presidency.

Thomson said he is leaving the Republican Party forever. He said he wants to regroup the nation's conservatives under an alternative to be known as the Constitution Party.

"Millions of Americans have lost confidence in the ability of either of the two major political parties to resolve the awesome problems facing our nation," he said. "In fact, both parties are equally guilty of the crises that presently face us on our domestic and international fronts."

Soviet troops may pose no threat

WASHINGTON (AP) — Secretary of State Cyrus R. Vance indicated yesterday the Soviets have taken steps in Cuba to reduce U.S. concerns about Russian troops there.

Vance, speaking at a news conference, was unwilling to provide details. But he said "some factors are different from what they were."

He added that while there is no basis yet for great optimism, the developments in Cuba, which are monitored closely by U.S. intelligence, are "not unpleasant."

Nuke report:

A 'band-aid' solution to problem

By TOM RAUM
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Carter's Three Mile Island commission drew fire from two key congressional chairmen yesterday for failing to recommend some form of moratorium on nuclear power plants.

"In the absence of a moratorium there will be a tendency to use Band-Aids where surgery is required," said Rep. Morris Udall, D-Ariz., chairman of the House Interior Committee.

And Sen. Gary Hart, D-Colo., chairman of the Senate nuclear regulation subcommittee, said, "I am troubled by the commission's decision not to recommend a delay in construction of new plants in light of its other findings."

Udall and Hart made the remarks in prepared opening statements for a joint hearing on the presidential commission's day-old findings.

Chairman John G. Kemeny and a majority of the 12-member presidential commission were to defend their 179-page report on the March 28 accident at the nuclear power plant near Harrisburg, Pa. The commission presented its report to the president Tuesday.

The report generally leveled a broad indictment at the nuclear industry and its regulators but stopped short of recommending a moratorium — an issue on which the commission was closely divided.

Meanwhile, an Associated Press-NBC News Poll showed yesterday that most Americans appear to favor a moratorium on new nuclear plants until safety issues can be resolved.

However, the majority sentiment for such a moratorium is not solely the result of the Three Mile Island accident. At most, the accident appears to have intensified existing support found for such a moratorium in an AP-NBC News poll late last year.

Although Udall indicated as recently as last summer an opposition to a nuclear moratorium, he said Wednesday he'd changed his mind — and now feels that at least a "conditional moratorium" is needed.

Poll: Halt plants, study them more

By EVANS WITT
Associated Press

NEW YORK — Americans disagree with a major finding of the president's commission on Three Mile Island, saying that no more nuclear power plants should be built until safety issues are resolved, an Associated Press-NBC News poll shows.

Majority sentiment for a moratorium on nuclear power plant construction is not a result of the accident at the Three Mile Island plant earlier this year. At most, the accident appears to have intensified the existing support found for such a moratorium in an AP-NBC News poll late last year.

The AP-NBC News poll on nuclear power is based on telephone interviews with 1,600 adults across the country on Oct. 15 and 16, well before the release of the commission's report Tuesday.

Each of the respondents was asked:

"Do you agree or disagree with the following statement: 'No more nuclear power plants should be built in this country until questions about safety are resolved, even though some say this will mean energy shortages within 10 years.?'"

In the interviews this month, 57 percent agreed with such a moratorium and 36 percent disagreed. Seven percent were not sure.

Mexico DC-10 crash kills 63

By JOE FRAZIER
Associated Press

MEXICO CITY — U.S. Federal Aviation Administration officials focused on a severed engine yesterday as they investigated the crash of a Western Airlines DC-10 jetliner that slammed onto a closed runway at smog-shrouded Mexico City airport, killing at least 63 of 88 or 89 persons on board.

The plane plowed into two buildings as it touched down on the runway, which was shut down for repairs. It went on to hit a parked truck and kill its driver, then scattered chunks of wreckage in a swath over a residential housing and slum tenement district. Workers said they could not determine immediately if anyone else was killed or injured on the ground.

One of the DC-10's three turbines came to rest intact near a fence about 900 feet from the rest of the wreckage. It was not known whether the engine fell from the plane before the crash or was hurled away on impact.

The U.S. Embassy here said the turbine was the tail engine of the DC-10. A spokesman said it landed on the side of the road, across the street from a densely populated slum district.

In Los Angeles, Western Airlines officials said the black box flight recorder was retrieved from the demolished airliner. The box was turned over to Mexican aviation authorities. In New York, aviation experts said it was too soon to say whether the crash would cause additional problems for McDonnell Douglas Corp., whose DC-10 fleet was grounded by the FAA for 37 days after the May 25 crash at Chicago's O'Hare Airport of an American Airlines DC-10. That crash killed 273 persons, the worst aviation disaster in U.S. history.

Red Cross and U.S. consular officials said 63 bodies were recovered from the scene, and 19 survivors were taken to three area hospitals. The fate of the other passengers was unknown. The nationalities of persons on the flight was not determined immediately but many names on the passenger list were Hispanic.

Western officials here said they listed 89 persons on board, but in Los Angeles, the airline said the plane had 88 occupants—77 passengers and 11 crew.

The ground in the area of the crash was strewn with pieces of the wreckage. Mangled bodies were recovered as far away as 100 feet from the building which the plane hit last.

'Women's Room' depicts 'female rage'

By SUSAN HOROWITZ
Collegian Staff

Marilyn French, best known for her novel, The Women's Room, spoke about her views on men, writing, feminism and anger in a recent Collegian interview.

The Women's Room released late in October 1977, immediately became a best-seller, and is one of the most controversial pieces of fiction published in quite some time.

The Women's Room has been bouncing around in French's head for years, she said. 'I finally knew what I was writing about — that it was female rage and revolution — and then the book practically wrote itself, she recalled.

The novel tells of the struggle of wives in the 50's and how they became women of the 70's.

The Women's Room had been bouncing around in French's head for years, she said. "I finally knew what I was writing about—that it was female rage and revolution—and then the book practically wrote itself, she recalled.

It was at this point that French was having financial difficulties. She said she left her teaching post at Holy Cross College and received only a small advance on her book. French's agent, Charlotte Sheedy came to the rescue by making some quick deals for movie and foreign publishing rights.

The book has been sold as a movie for television which, French said, does not make her very happy. She said she fears the movie will not capture the theme of the book, and many of the incidences may be radically changed. There have been problems surrounding production, French said, so movie plans have not yet solidified.

French said many people feel she hates men because of the anger expressed in The Women's Room. When asked if this is true, French said, "It's sinful in this culture to attack men. I mean you can attack one man, but not all men. I hate the sin and love the sinner; the men I meet expect me to bite their heads off."

Many readers of The Women's Room feel as though the novel parallels the author's life, according to French.

"The story follows the general outline of my life. Married too young, two children, divorced, educated later on at Harvard. But the character of Mira is not me. My husband was nothing like Mira's husband, Norm. I've had similar relationships and experiences, but I am not Mira," she said.

French said she feels angry, and her lecture and interview proved her anger is positive. She said she hopes women will no longer have to exist in a male-oriented world, but that men and women should and must pool their efforts and coexist in a people-oriented world.

Incident at Russell's remains hazy issue

By BRIAN O'CONNELL
Collegian Staff

Questions remain unanswered concerning the recent arrest of three women charged with disorderly conduct at Russell's Package Store in Amherst on September 29.

The three women, Ada Griffin, a Hampshire College student, Gina Stevens, an Amherst College student, and Sheila Johnson, an Amherst College librarian, are scheduled to be tried Nov. 21 at Hampshire District Court in Northampton.

A press release issued by the Amherst Defense Committee, now working on the case, was published in several area newspapers. It charged the three women "were attacked and physically brutalized by four Amherst police officers...while making a purchase at Russell's Liquor store on September 29."

Store owner William Russell has denied the charges.

Defendant Griffin said Tuesday night she had not given her version of the incident to anyone on the committee, and was not sure how they received their information.

At a rally on the Amherst Common last Saturday, Johnson said store owner Russell was not there at the time of the incident. Johnson also said the three women were "abused physically" and were unfairly accused of stealing liquor by Amherst Police.

Amherst College Professor Andrea Rushing, who is working closely with the defendants on the case, yesterday expressed concern over discrepancies concerning the incident at Russell's. "Something is out of control here," Rushing said of recently published reports. "They (defendants) were advised not to tell their stories before they went to court."

The Amherst Defense Committee could not be reached for comment.

A witness of the incident, who asked not to be identified, said "the whole thing was blown out of proportion," and added both sides were "just as guilty of screwing up the facts..." The witness also said the women were guilty of instigating the dispute, but that store managers and Amherst police "didn't help the situation."

Store owner Russell last night expressed concern over reported contradictions and discrepancies.

"Every time I see the story, it changes," he said.

Russell added he didn't believe the women "had too many witnesses," and said, "I don't think their charges are going to stand up in court."

Howe lecture gives outline of Judaism's development

By NORM WHITEHURST
Collegian Staff

"Historically, Yiddish culture is coming to an end," last night said Irving Howe, author of World of Our Fathers, at a lecture at Amherst College.

The lecture, titled "The End of Jewish Secularism," depicted the constant struggle of Jews from the beginning of history.

Howe said there are fewer and fewer "true Jews" practicing the faith today. He described the religion as a "culture with inner tensions."

Howe outlined changes in Judaism, tracing it back from Eastern Europe to where it is today.

His lecture mainly stressed the "enlightenment" period in the eighteenth century. This was a time when Jews were first becoming recognized as educated people, according to Howe. During this time Jews underwent a period of belief and skepticism which was the beginning of the Jew's secularism, he said.

Jews had a choice for the first time to choose to practice the religion or remain impartial to it, according to Howe. Unfortunately, he said, many Jews remained impartial.

"If the Jewish culture is fading, the least we can do is say farewell with gratitude," he said.

Howe, 59, has taught English at Brandeis University, Stanford University, and currently teaches at Hunter College in New York City.

The author of eight books, Howe has received many awards including the Longview Foundation Prize for literary criticism and recently the National Book Award for World of Our Fathers.

Senate creates position for Anti-Racism Coordinator

By JOAN McKENZIE
Collegian Staff

The Undergraduate Student Senate last night passed a motion to create the position of an Anti-Racism Coordinator to fulfill a Senate mandate establishing the Campaign to Combat Racism.

Funding is to be secured from the Student Center for Research Education and Advocacy. The Senate approved an amendment to exempt SCERA from a partial budget cut of $3,800. The cut was to be made in an effort to liquidate an RSO deficit of $200,000.

"If SCERA was not exempted they would have to take a budget cut of $9,926" said SGA Treasurer William Fitzgerald.

The partial exemption of $3,800 will help secure the position that will be 40 hours a week at $5 an hour for the remainder of the fiscal year. The total cost for the position is $6,126.

Originally, $4,626 was to have been taken from SCERA, $1,000 from Finance and $500 from General Administrative Admissions. SGA President Brian Burke made an amendment to allocate SCERA money from its own funds to pay the total cost of $6,126.

LaVoice, prior to announcing the appointment of Hensleigh, asked the senate of they wished him to table his decision until he could personally interview the three finalists. LaVoice said since he did not see such sentiment he would move to appoint Hensleigh to the position.

Hensleigh told the senate he had planned to revamp the Senate Judiciary Board in his earlier term as Attorney General. He said, however, when he became co-President "My successor Robin Adams didn't carry out the things I had started and used the office to do a hatchet job on my co-President Herb Tvson."

Brian Burke said he felt the Senate mis-interpreted their role in rejecting Hensleigh. He said the Senate should only accept or reject the appointment.

Merrell Green, another search committee member said, "The search committee is to screen and reject candidates and render an advisory opinion to the presidents."

In other action, the Senate rejected a proposal to give Attorney General appointment powers to a search committee with final approval by passing the presidents and going directly to the Senate.

Pierce will continue as acting Attorney General until a new one is appointed.

'Just Friends of 1923' opens tonight

By DEBBIE WALLACE
Collegian Staff

For 19 hours daily since September, Peter Niemczura had been sewing costumes for the upcoming UMass Music Theater Guild production, "Just Friends of 1923." But Niemczura is more than a seamstress – he wrote the play.

Niemczura has been working at this pace so he can meet the deadline for completing the elaborate costumes for the debut of his musical on Thursday.

A former UMass English major, Niemczura has written five musicals but this is the first of his works to be performed. "Just Friends of 1923" was inspired by his interest in history, he said, and he picked the year, 1923, because "it is least characteristic of the 1920s."

The play is about love relationships in the Van Welltadew family and one woman's struggle to be accepted into high society.

Niemczura has no influence in the direction of the play but is present at most rehearsals. Assistant director/state manager Larry Geddes said of the author: "It has been good to have the playwright at rehearsal. He has given the actors family background on the characters."

And producer Tony Magner said of the new play: "(it) Gives the artistic directors an opportunity to experiment. There are no set rules so we have a great liberty with the show."

Director Peter Tolan said: "A new show interested me. All of the blocking is a first and my concept of the play is new."

The cast of 36 consists of UMass theater and non-theater majors and five Smith College students.

Neimczura occasionally sits down to watch one of the rehearsals – which often times have been divided among buildings on campus with the chorus and players rehearsing separately – but he abruptly leaves to continue sewing: "The costumes will be finished by opening night even if it takes no sleep."

"Just Friends of 1923" will be presented in Bowker Auditorium tonight through Saturday night, and Nov. 8-10 at 8 p.m.

Theatre offers variety, excitement

By MICHAEL MARTINEAN
Collegian Staff

If you're tired of boring, predictable weekends and are wondering how to get out of your rut, ask yourself a question: "When was the last time I saw a play?"

Probably it was when you acted in your high school play. For two weeks your English class suffered through Shakespeare's, "Hamlet," while your teacher read it aloud to the class everyday. Yet none of the students understood what all the "thees," "thous," and "forsooths" meant, except that weird kid in your gym class, who couldn't climb a rope, but was in all the plays.

This seems to be typical of most people's first exposure to theatre. Small wonder that when they grow up they watch mindless television sitcoms like "Mork and Mindy."

Theatre seems to scare people. Some think theatregoers must be intellectuals. Most people are unaware that theatre offers the same subject variety as movies, but theatre is live. The big screen may be mesmerising but in theatre the audience may participate or feel more involved in the production by the essentiality of its presence.

Theatre can be comedy, including high-brow, down-to-earth and locker-room humor. Drama, Gothic horrow, high romance and musicals, or violence and gratuitous nudity.

Take a chance. It's worth the gamble. Go see a play. Shop around and see what looks interesting.

Breaks at education offices 'similar'

By KAREN LIBUCHA
Collegian Staff

Two "similar" break-ins involving offices of the Hampshire Educational Collaborative this week are under investigation by police, UMass Sgt. Micheal Grabiec said last night.

Amherst police received a report at 10:43 a.m. Monday that the Collaborative's office had windows smashed and tools taken.

UMass police also said the old infirmary cottage on Thatcher Way, where the Collaborative's Alternative Learning Program is stationed, was broken into Tuesday. The window on the door on the east side of the building was broken and $460 worth of equipment was stolen.

"Since both crimes were done in basically the same way, probably the person was involved-in the (Alternative Learning) Program," Grabiec said.

Taken from the old infirmary cottage was an Underwood electric typewriter, a Rockwell sabre power saw, a cash box with no money in it, a three-eighths inch power drill and a G.E. stereo and speakers, according to the police report.

Hillel brings Drinan

Congressman Robert F. Drinan (Mass. 4th District) will speak this Sunday, Nov. 4th, at noon in the Student Union Ballroom, according to a Hillel press release.

Drinan, an ordained priest, is being sponsored by the B'nai B'rith Hillel Foundation, a Jewish organization on campus, said Marion Hait, the group's administrative assistant.

"He was chosen last summer by Hillel because he is pro-Israel," said Hait.

Drinan, a noted consumer rights advocate, is among the top quarter of all U.S. representatives in voting to cut federal spending during 1978

Editorial/Opinion

'GEE, I'M SORRY, OFFICER — I'M JUST WAITING FOR SOME FRIENDS WHO ARE MAKING A QUICK, ROUTINE TRANSACTION INSIDE.'

Perhaps the law would be better spent drowned in booze

Jackson Katz

The drinking age was raised more than six months ago, but the issue is far from dead. And yet, as the absurdity of the law in practice becomes increasingly apparent, no one is publicly dealing with the reality of the situation.

A lot has been written concerning new alcohol rules and regulations and party restrictions, and countless authorities pay "lip service" to obeying these as the "law of the Commonwealth". Officials talk of the cooperation of all in helping to enforce the law and maintain order, and continue to assert that things are working.

Who are they kidding? Misleading or circumvential rhetoric about the positive effects of the raised age does little to veil the reality of the situation—that thousands of people on this campus and hundreds of thousands across the state drink illegally every weekend.

By raising the drinking age and talking about law enforcement rather than confronting the situation as it exists, the people who supposedly care so much about us continue to deny basic realities of our lives.

How long will this charade go on?

It is true that many 18 and 19-year-olds don't control their use of alcohol. But this is true of any age group. The "responsible" use of alcohol is more a function of maturity than of age. Thus the implication is apparent, that the supporters of the raised legal age don't consider 18 and 19-year-olds mature.

We've heard it before, but the contradictions involved here are still glaring. Remember, when talk of bringing back the draft was in the news, did Gov. King raise his voice in an impassioned plea and claim that 18-year-olds are too immature to go and die for their country?

The people who supported and passed the law are simply not in touch with kids—and as far as they're concerned, they really don't have to be. We all know that young people don't represent themselves adequately at election time, and the intense feelings of oppressed 18 and 19-year-olds often pass when they reach the legal age.

People of all ages often complain that the government has taken so much control over people's lives that it has become oppressive. Is putting a 19-year-old in jail for drinking a beer merely oppressive? Isn't it ludicrous as well?

And if there's equality of justice under the law, as our "leaders" would have us believe, how come they won't arrest all the illegal drinkers and not just a random, token sampling? Maybe because the idiocy of the situation would be exposed if more 18 and 19-year-olds were in jail than out!

Regardless of what anyone in a "position of authority" tells us, there is one thing we must remember when we drink, illegally or otherwise. Unreasonable government regulation need not be sanctified. Drinking is our human right. But just as this is so, so is it our responsibility not to infringe upon the rights of others, as Ed King and his supporters have done to us.

So, with all this said, we can continue to talk about alcohol rules and regulations, as if the law isn't a total farce. We can refrain from dealing with the reality of the situation, and go on playing word games, using fake I.D.'s, and having legal drinkers buy for 18 and 19-year-olds.

In short, we can live in the dream world that Ed King guaranteed everyone who supported the raised legal drinking age.

But life isn't really that bad a dream, is it?

Letters

Remember Mr. Bill?

To the Editor:

I sympathize with the three women who were harassed at Russell's liquor store.

Four years ago I was purchasing alcohol at Russell's liquor store. They needed two picture I.D.s to accept a check. I gave them a license and a military I.D. but was told that they were inadequate because one I.D. had to be a student I.D. I made a casual statement as to the discriminatory procedure allowing only student I.D.s and not accepting other legitimate I.D.s, but was pulling our my wallet to pay cash when William Russell (whom I hadn't been dealing with) grabbed my Jack Daniels and interjected into the conversation stating "That is my policy and if you do not agree with it leave my store."

He stood inches away from me, as if he wanted to fight, totally making a scene out of a casual conversation.

I told him that I did not agree with his policy and especially didn't patronize assholes. I've never been back to Russell's package store and have heard of many similar experiences from other people.

I'm glad William Russell has finally received the negative exposure he deserves.

Jay Fredkin
260 Daniel Shays Highway
Pelham, Massachusetts

(Ed. note—When Bill Russell, the owner of the store, was read this letter over the phone he made a few points. He said, "The guy must have had something go on with the clerk. If they can't accept the procedure we ask them to leave. We don't have time on the weekends to discuss it with them—they walk out calling us every name in the book. Most of the problems come about because we accept checks.")

Story emphasized false differences

To the Editor

Recently in an article about two groups "competing" for campus landscape plans, the Collegian exaggerated the differences between the Environmental Design project of the CC/SU Board of Governors and the administration's Campus Landscape Improvement Project (or CLIP). These 2 groups are not competing with one another, but are collaborating in order to try to improve the landscape of our campus. Both groups want to utilize some of the limited resources available to the University in order to plan and cause the implementation of improvements in land-forms, pedestrian paths, plantings, and built features and facilities.

Most of the differences between the groups are minor. Both seek to prepare plans which can be used for taking action. The CLIP projects looks at the entire University, with an emphasis on the pedestrian pathway between Whitmore and the SU and the outside of the CC/SU complex, while the ED group considers only the CC/SU complex and its immediate environs. The CLIP project is staffed by professionals, while the ED group has only a part-time student coordinator.

Yet in spite of these differences, both the ED project and CLIP are working together instead of competing. Both groups agree on a master-plan for Metawaumpee Lawn that includes a barbecue site, an outdoor cafe, and provisions for use as an amphitheater. And both groups have worked together in preparing a display of specific proposals to renovate the sadly deteriorated south patio of the Student Union. This is budgeted for and could become done in spring 1980. Their proposal is on display behind the Collegian stand in the SU Lobby.

Sick...

To the Editor:

Great! Have fun on Halloween. Make up a costume, have a few hundred beers, give everyone a hard time, but when it comes to endangering 14 trusting horses asleep in their place of security—well that is going just a little too far.

Horses, for many people, have a certain something about them, a mystery, symbolizing that free spirit in all of us. To take and deliberately destroy that freedom as was done Friday night, October 26, was inexcusable. One of the most valuable Thoroughbred broodmares owned by the university was so badly frightened in her stall that she jumped out over the top, falling to her side on the concrete floor of the barn. In her continued effort to escape her tormentor, she crashed through the heavy main door of the barn spending the rest of the night in a panicked state of shock. All four legs were severely damaged in her attempt at escape, so much so that we doubt total freedom of movement will ever be hers again. She was carrying a foal and at the time of this writing we are uncertain as to whether or not she will abort.

In our opinion, this goes beyond the practical joke, the Halloween prank, so common and usually so harmless. This was an act of deliberate cruelty, going beyond any masochistic enjoyment of an animal's helplessness at human hands. Someone this weekend got their "psychotic thrills" to the detriment of one of the most beautiful horses, for whom we are proud to be responsible. And, if the morality of this act goes over your heads, all you would-be horse thieves, at least consider the severity of the punishment involved in damaging and/or stealing university (state) property.

Think twice next time and maybe there will be no next time; but does it matter, the damage is done. Happy Halloween.

No nukes?

To the Editor:

I am concerned with the abundance of anti-nuke sentiment displayed on this campus. Nuclear Power plants which make use of nuclear fission are extremely dangerous because of problems with waste disposal and radiation leakage. But on the other hand, one of our great hopes for the energy future of our country lies in the increased research into nuclear fusion. There's a big difference between fusion and fission. Fusion makes energy though the use of hydrogen.

Hydrogen fusion requires that hydrogen is heated to a temperature at which the nuclei stick together and fuse. A result of this process is the creation of energy. There is no danger of radioactive wastes or explosions.

Hydrogen is abundant, being found in seawater, and could possibly provide energy for billions of years. From now on let's hear, "Down with Nuclear Fission!" I wonder if Jerry Brown knows the difference?

Grad Senate approves limited library access

By LAURA SMITH
Collegian Staff

The Graduate Student Senate approved a recommendation Tuesday night which would allow faculty, graduate students, and selected undergraduates access to the library when it opens on a limited basis.

It also approved a motion urging Chancellor Henry Koffler to investigate the issue of alternative study space on campus.

Senator Ken Ross, from the Linguistics Department and the graduate representative on the Faculty Senate Library Committee, said the library will restrict occupancy to 500 at any time. Undergraduates at a library committee October 25 opposed graduate students' exclusive rights to access, although Ross said the Goodell Library fulfills most undergraduate needs.

Undergraduates working on senior honors thesis, or who have unique needs, as determined by the library staff, will also be admitted, he said.

Ross supported the request to search for more adequate study space to alleviate problems and complaints voiced by various undergraduate student groups.

In another motion, the senate voted to approve a demand by the affirmative Action Search Committee urging Vice Chancellor Madson to reopen the search for an Affirmative action Coordinator for student affairs.

Ruth Backes, Graduate Senate representative on the search committee, said the vice-chancellor has decided to conduct a formal external search for the position in lieu of the alternative selection process of a University appointment. "It should be done properly by following guidelines for a national search for positions with salaries over $16,000," she said.

According to the guidelines in the Policy Manual, neither an adequate national, regional, nor local search was conducted, Backes said. "Advertisements for the position only appeared for one day in the Boston Globe, Springfield Union, Amherst Record, and the Hampshire Gazette, which was hardly adequate," she charged.

Ross said an inadequate search could have been done "on purpose because they (the administration) have someone else outside the University in mind."

Environmentalists oppose offshore drilling

By FRED BAYLES
Associated Press

BOSTON – Attorneys seeking to halt offshore oil drilling on Georges Bank charged yesterday that the federal government's plan to lease underwater sites "grossly underestimates" the impact an oil spill would have on the rich fishing grounds.

The attorneys, representing Massachusetts and a coalition of environmentalists and fishermen, asked a federal judge to block the government's plan to sell underwater tracts next week in Providence.

"The plan to sell the sites is an arbitrary and capricious decision," said Douglas Foy, an attorney for the Conservation Law Foundation of New England. "We are asking the court to force the federal agencies in this case to act rationally and reasonably."

The foundation and the state of Maine joined Massachusetts Attorney General Francis X. Bellotti in trying to bar the sale of 660,000 acres located about 100 miles east of Nantucket.

Attorneys for the state contend the U.S. Interior Department has failed to consider the environmental impact of offshore oil drilling. And they charged federal officials were too hasty in September when they turned down a request to declare the area a marine sanctuary.

"No other case of this kind has dealt with a resource of the enormity of Georges Bank," Foy told U.S. District Judge John J. McNaught at a packed court session. "We are dealing with the sale of the world's greatest fishery."

Foy cited federal studies of Georges Bank which said the 20,000 square mile area of shallow shoals produces some 250,000 million pounds of fish a year and could provide a harvest of one billion pounds of fish annually.

Foy said studies by the U.S. Department of Commerce put the economic value of the fishing grounds to the region at nearly $3.2 billion a year.

He claimed an environmental impact study by the U.S. Interior Department "ignored the uniqueness of Georges Bank" and minimized the dangers of oil spills from the offshore wells.

"The environmental impact statement is inadequate," said Foy. "It grossly underestimates the potential damage to the fisheries."

Foy said studies by the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration show that a major gas or oil spill would cause irreparable harm to the spawning ground.

"Oil introduced to this environment wold be circulated through it for months at a time," Foy said.

Assistant Attorney General Stephen Leonard said the decision not to declare the area a federal marine sanctuary was made without an adequate environmental study of the area.

The federal government originally planned to put the offshore tracts up for bid in 1978, but U.S. District Judge W. Arthur Garrity Jr. issued an injunction against the lease-bidding process in January of that year.

The injunction was lifted last February, after Congress updated the Outer Continental Shelf Lands Act to assure tougher standards for drilling operations.

Calling planet Earth

UMass is now home to an "earth terminal." The dish-like object, measuring 15 feet in diamater and standing 20 feet off the ground, is located at the corner of Massachusetts and Commonwealth Avenues, across from Southwest Residential Area. The terminal is a receiving antenna for the Westar I communications satellite, part of a link-up of the over 200 public radio stations across the U.S. and Puerto Rico.

The terminal will provide WFCR–public radio for Western Mass., located in Hampshire House on campus–with a wider selection of programming with full fidelity.

The link-up, which is primarily funded by the corporation for public broadcasting, replaces a telephone line connection.

Project work began in May this year, and is expected to be completed by May 1980.

Right: Final adjustments are made on the antenna by Randy Bloomquist of Andrews Corporation. Above, the completed antenna structure. (Staff photos by Bill Lewis and Richard Newman).

Booters need scorer

By MIKE ESTRADA
Collegian Staff

With a few exceptions, this has been a very mediocre year for the UMass soccer team. They have played up to the caliber with such New England powers as URI (1-0) and UConn (3-2) but coming close does not help your ranking and ultimately your chances for an NCAA tournament berth. Add to that the fact that the Minutemen cannot even compete in the ECAC because of a television contract not even involving soccer and you have a team that must do all-or-nothing.

Commentary

UMass has talent, even surprising talent, but its overall line-up, when put side to side with UConn's Joe Morrones they just don't compare. The one thing UMass soccer lacks is a player who can score goals, lots of goals, a person who can be fed inside and always get a shot off. The last such player at UMass is now pro in Greece, Tasso Koutsoukos. Not effective last year as in 1977, Koutsoukos was what coach Russ Kidd referred to as "a game finisher." UMass had the personel to deal with UConn last Saturday, but they didn't have the one guy to go for the clutch goal.

"You just don t get players like that without scholarships," said Kidd, whose biggest job is trying to harbor talent from those schools who have plenty of money to give. UMass soccer last gave scholarships in 1972, the year of the infamous Title IX decision.

As Kidd stood by the sidelines answering questions after the loss to UConn, he stated that he didn't have "two-cents" to give to his recuruits. "That was more than a two-cent team," remarked a reporter after witnessing an near UMass upset. There's little doubt the team plays with heart, and it shows in a game that ultimately means nothing except the sharpening of game skills.

UMass' loss to UNH was the start of the Wildcats running off four straight wins. The loss to BU was amidst the Terriers return from the dead after being counted out in NCAA competition.

"We've had a good spirit all year," said freshman Gus Martins. "Its just that when things start going bad (BU, UNH) its hard to overcome them in one game. There's only a couple of teams better than us, we are one of the best teams in New England."

Netwomen news

By DAVE SIVRET
Collegian Staff

The women's tennis team ended their season on a losing note by dropping their final match of the year to Harvard on Tuesday. The final score of the match was 5-4 and the loss dropped their season's mark below .500 for the first time this year at 6-7.

This match was a continuation of a match that had been rained out earlier in the season with the score tied at one 1. Unfortunately the women from Harvard were able to win the required 4 matches that they needed to and took the match.

"We didn't play that bad, they just played better. When ever we play Harvard we tend to get intimidated and give away a few points that we normally wouldn't," stated coach John Beal.

The winners for the netwomen were Chris Carson (6-4, 6-3), and Barbara Mills (6-2, 6-2) in singles and the doubles team of Fran Troy and Beth Goldberg (4-6, 6-4, 7-5).

Coach Beal expressed some disappointment that the team didn't go further with the taler.t they had this season. ("At the start of the season I felt that we had a good shot at going through the season only losing a match or two but unfortunately we played poorly in a few matches that we should have won. It seemed like the women took some of the matches too lightly (UConn, UNH, Smith) and when the team appeared stronger then they folded," said Coach Beal.

He cited the Springfield College as one where the team battled back to win a tough match. "If we had been able to do that more often we would have done quite a bit better."

On the more positive side, the team is graduating no seniors and with this year as seasoning they should be a squad to be watched next fall.

Spikers sweep Hartford, EConn

By MAUREEN SULLIVAN
Collegian Staff

The women's volleyball team added two wins to its ledger Tuesday night when it swept the University of Hartford 15-11, 15-10, and cruised over Eastern Connecticut 15-6, 15-7, at Hartford.

"Everybody played well," said Coach Elaine Marasco. "We managed to pick apart their offenses with blocking and good passing, and we played a good game overall."

Now 16-6, the Minutewomen travel to Northampton tonight for a 7:00 p.m. match against Smith College.

Last year, Smith surprised UMass with shows of defense. However, the Minutewomen swept, 15-13, 15-11, 15-11.

Said Marasco of tonight's match, "The match is important to us; we want to keep our momentum going for the rest of the season."

The JV's host Northeastern University at NOPE gym tonight at 7:00 p.m. A mixup in the Huskie's schedule caused the match, scheduled for last night, to be moved up to this evening.

Coached by Al Morel, the JV's record stands at 3-1.

Martin's goal lifts booters over Owls, 1-0

By MIKE ESTRADA
Collegian Staff

Freshman Gus Martins' second college career goal at 52:33 provided a satisfactory conclusion to an otherwise ill-played, penalty ridden game at Boyden yesterday, as the Minutemen avenged a year long memory, downing Westfield State 1-0.

Hoping to keep a physical game under control, the referees' whistle was heard an incredible 50 times in the contest, making the second half a garden of penalties. While neither team was innocent of offenses, the Westfield Owls' bench vocalized their discontent with most of the 23 offenses called against them.

It was a day for surprising statistics as the Minutemen received 12 corner kicks, seven in the first half, but could not capitalize; several head shots going over the bar.

The game could be labeled a rivalry, stemming to last years game at Westfield when the Owls downed the Minutemen 1-0, to end their waining NCAAA tournament hopes

This year UMass played the spoiler, handing Division Three power Westfield their fifth loss, damaging the Owls' chances of making their divisions playoffs in the NCAA.

The Minutemen, now 5-4-2, is going nowhere after this season by virtue of the UMass' resignation from the ECAC, but pride is more than a feeling, particularly against Westfield.

Owl goalie Dave Mason was the only reason the visitors were not destroyed early. On a corner kick at 7:00 Mason tipped a head shot over the bar. On the ensuing corner kick, tri-captain Mike St. Martin, whose determination is never lacking in any game, had to head a shot over Mason and missed the bar by a foot.

On the first of three injury timeouts for UMass in the game, Sophomore Doug White, the team assist co-leader with three, was tripped by a Owl defender early in the second half and was forced to leave the game. UMass coach Russ Kidd went to a four man front line with Martins and turned them loose.

"We put a couple of guys on the inside and Gus got loose," Kidd said.

Martins, himself hampered with a leg injury, picked up a Wayne Moran rebound and fired home a shot to an open net to give the Minutemen all they needed.

Freshman goalie Matt Esteves was called into duty midway through the second half when starting goalie Mark Marilla became part of the field when he was kicked in the face by the Owl's David Sousa on an attempted slide-tackle. Esteves, a Ludlow native, filled in well for Marilla, displaying his half-field boots off his four saves.

BOOTER BANTER: UMass goalie Mark Marilla was fourth in Yankee conference netminders as of last week with a 1.11 goals-against average in nine games...Senior Wayne Moran is the team scoring leader with six goals and three assists for nine total points...The Minutemen play Boston College this Saturday before their only night game of the year next Wednesday at Springfield. Their game against the Crimson of Harvard, rained out earlier this year, has been rescheduled for November 13 at Boyden field.

Women hold holiday race

By RHONDA J. MONTGOMERY
Collegian Staff

A women's costume road race was held yesterday in the spirit of Halloween starting at Alumni Stadium. The race was sanctioned by the New England A.A.U. and co-sponsored by UMass students Elaine Koenig and Evelyn Resh. According to organizers of the event, two weeks prior to the race, the Amherst Police gave their consent. On the day of the race the police then refused to allow the women to run on the town roads claiming the women needed a permit and police supervision. The race was then moved to the stadium.

The distance of the race was 6.8 miles, four laps around Commonwealth Avenue surrounding the football stadium. Elaine Koenig said she hopes this will be a beginning for the development of more women's athletic events in the future. In the spring she is planning to organize a woman's "Take Back the Night" race.

The entire field in yesterday's race consisted of 25 women runners. All of them received T-shirts for their appreciated efforts and holiday spirit. Their costumes varied from a colonial style, to a Wonder Woman, to a mouse, and to a cowgirl. The prize for first place went to UMass senior Barbara Callahan. She, along with second place winner Cindy Martin, also a UMass senior, led the entire race well ahead of the field. Both women run for the UMass track team as half-milers. Their times were 41.06 and 41.07. Third place went to Merry Cushing with a time of 44.20. A prize of a jack-o-lantern was awarded to 53-year-old Loretta Ivan or best costume. Loretta said she has been running since she was 40. Her time was 47.20.

Sports spurts

Regardless of what the seasonal climate is, sports of all genders continue to flourish in the news. And I, being of a partially sound mind and questionably sound body, wish to put forth unto you, the readership, my opinions of some particular issues.

Baseball, despite the fact that the World Series has ended and tarpaulins now cover the various infields in the major league cities, continues to find its way onto the sports pages of America.

Free agency in baseball has become synonymous with success; if you want to be a winner, you have to sign the big name free agents. In antithesis to this, let's take a look at our own Boston Red Sox. With the exception of Tom Burgmier, the free agent invasion has not been kind to the Hose. Mike Torrez has increased his acceleration into the world of mediocrity since becoming a million dollar magnate, Bill Campbell has blown his arm out, and Jack Brohamer has torn up his knee, not to mention Steve Renko, who came out of the starting blocks like a race horse and ended up like an old nag being sent to a glue factory in Illinois.

If this trend of free agent disasters is to continue, perhaps the Red Sox would be better off leaving Bob Watson alone. After all, technically he is a free agent and if he signs with Boston the odds are that the pins in his shoulder will come apart and his arm will drop off at home plate the first time he takes a swing.

Hot on the heels of the Willie Mays incident, the NFL is launching an investigation into possible ties between Oakland Raiders tight end Ted Hendricks and organized crime. Mr. Kuhn really started something big this time. Perhaps baseball fans should all chip in a few cents and when we collect five hundred dollars we could offer it to Billy Martin to put Kuhn on his keester.

Now that his professional football days have subsided, former Pittsburgh Steelers and New England Patriots defensive lineman Ernie Holmes has decided to become a professional boxer. How long do you think it will take before Wide World of Sports, Sports Spectacular, or Sportworld announces a pugilistic exhibition between Holmes and former Dallas Cowboy Ed "Too Tall' Jones?

Bob Montgomery has declared himself a free agent. Whoopee.

If professional hockey wants to survive, it must make a commitment to bring the game back into the limelight and not the fighting. The line by comedian Rodney Dangerfield, "I went to a fight the other night and a hockey game broke out," only goes to show that league president John Zeigler is a blithering dolt when it comes to running a professional sports league. The game once belonged to the swiftest and most talented teams; now it belongs to those with the best one-two combination and knockout punch.

It's interesting to note that two of the slightly less than Super Bowl bound teams, Kansas City and Washington, are leading their respective conferences in fewest points allowed.

I wonder if it wouldn't be better to wait in assigning player compensation for free agents signed in basketball until after the free agent has performed for his new team. I mentioned in an earlier column that San Diego got rooked in the Bill Walton compensation, losing Kermit Washington, Kevin Kunnert, et al for a physically "iffy" talent. And as it turns out, "Gimpy" Walton is on crutches again, making the compensation look even more ludicrous than it first did.

Learn to take losing with pride, David Thompson.

Swados' literature dedicated

By PAUL BANKS
Collegian Staff

"It's our extraordinary good fortune that the spirit of this man lives on for us in the books that he has left," said Hilton Kramer, art critic of the New York Times, last night at a dedication of the papers of Harvey Swados.

Kramer, one of several speakers, spoke to family, friends, and colleagues of Swados gathered to acknowledge the purchase of the papers, which contain Swado's manuscripts and correspondences to the literary world. The papers of Swados, one of the most prominent literary figures in America, were accepted in a ceremony last night. Katherine Emerson, the UMass Archivist, said, "In accepting the papers UMass is undertaking the obligation of preserving our national he itage." A display of the papers is presently on dislay in Memorial Hall auditorium.

Swados gained distinction during his life as both a writer of fiction, and an essayist. He died on December 11, 1972, of Aneurism at 52. The books he wrote include "On the Line." "False Coin." "Nights in the Gardens of Brooklyn," "A Radicals America," "Years of Conscience," "The Will," "The American Writer and The Great Depression," "Radical at Large," "Standing Fast," and "Celebration."

Swados' stories and essays appeared in publications ranging from The New York Times to Dissent Magazine, of which he was editor from the early 1950's to the 1960's.

Swados taught at Sarah Lawrence College, San Francisco State College, the University of Iowa, Columbia University, and here at the University. He was a distinguished professor and the Master of the Fine Arts program in English, the last years of his life.

Saul Bellow, famous writer and author, says that "When the literary history of the last few decades is written, Harvey Swados is sure to figure prominently in it because he was a writer of great talent and because he represented better than anyone else the social views he espoused."

Of his own contributions to American literature, Swados once stated, "If I have attempted to maintain a tension between skepticism and idealism, I have also attempted to secure some kind of personal connection between the writing of these essays about my America and the creation of fiction."

"In the process my kinship has been with those writers who imply, even when they treat of trouble and terror, that the world could be better, just as my commitment has been to those human beings who believe—despite every awful evidence to the contrary—that the world must be better." This, perhaps better than anything other, explains what the Harvey Swados papers are about.

UMass Chancellor Henry Koffler said last night that the papers will have "a permanent home on this campus. They are a very deserving memory of him."

Handicapped students seek to create campus awareness

By ELLEN TUCHMAN
Collegian Staff

"People shouldn't think of what we can't do, but what we can do," Amy Hasbrouck said.

Hasbrouck, a freshman who is blind, is one of the members of the Handicapped Student Collective.

Although handicapped students face many problems which many UMass students are unaware of, recent renovations such as lowered telephones, water fountains, modified bathrooms and ramps exemplify the growing awareness of the handicapped's needs.

"We don't want to necessarily change policies, but rather create an awareness...," said Sandy Cohen, vice-president of the Handicapped Student Collective.

Also working to increase campus awareness is the collective, which consists of both physically handicapped and non-handicapped students. Workshops are scheduled to get other students in tune with needs of the handicapped students by informing them of the physical and social barriers which they face.

Seemingly minor dangers such as broken glass on campus is especially hazardous to blind or mobility handicapped students. Vandalism might not be as prevalent if one was aware of this face, said Sandy Cohen.

In addition, organizations should choose buildings that can facilitate the attendence of the handicapped students when scheduling programs at the University, she said.

Cohen and the collective have set up a task force to suggest screening for medical singles. Cohen cited a proposal for next fall, where students requesting single rooms will have to pay an additional $75 for a double room, $50 for a single room. These rates are to apply to handicapped students, too. The collective is looking to ensure that the people who need medical singles will receive one at no additional fee.

"For most students, a single is a luxury and convenience, but for disabled students, it is a necessity," Cohen said.

The three criteria for the singles would be: a life support system or other equipment (wheelchairs, teletype units). a severe emotional problem, or the need for an attendant and privacy.

First an application from the Housing Office would be completed followed by an interview with a screening committee, including a physician, Cohen said.

This policy must be presented to the Student Affairs Committee and Student Senate to be passed.

Collective members Hasbrouck and Cohen, a mobility handicapped student, and the Director of Deaf Services at Handicapped Student Affairs, Merle Ryan, have developed a program for children. They will speak to a 4th grade class at Marks Meadow Elementary School on Monday about physical handicaps in general.

A film "Handicapism" will be shown, three wheelchairs will be brought to the class, and blindness will be simulated in an attempt to familiarize the children with handicaps. "This is a good age to reach," Cohen said. She said she would be happy to do this in other groups if this is successful.

Handicapped students will be meeting with the administration's Handicapped Student Affairs personnel to improve communication between the two groups—gripes, comments, and suggestions will be aired, Paul Appleby, Director of Handicapped Student Affairs said. The first meeting will be held November 13.

Liz McConnell, from the physical education department, wants to set up an adaptive physical education program at UMass for handicapped students of an interest is shown. There is no program now, except for handicapped swimming hours at NOPE gym.

Of the handicapped renovations in progress, Cohen said, "There are a lot of disabled students on this campus and that alone is enough to warrant modifications. Also, if there's a ramp it benefits people with bikes, for example. Elderly people are helped by enlarged bathrooms."

Mobility handicapped students utilize the van service to get around campus. There are two vans which transport the permanently and temporarily handicapped students to their classes. Operated by two full-time drivers and 4 part-time drivers, the vans run from 7:30-10:30 p.m. Monday—Thursday and on Fridays till 1 a.m. Saturday service is from noon—1 a.m. and there is no Sunday service. "The van service is great, but more is needed," Cohen said.

The present Pioneer Valley Transit Authority buses are not equipped for handicapped passengers. The collective has been working for the past two years on the transportation problem, Cohen said. The van service promotes segregation and handicapped students would prefer lift-equipped buses, she added. This would make it easier fo handicapped students to enter the mainstream of UMass life.

"People in wheelchairs don't want to be pitied or receive special treatment—they just want to be treated like everyone else and have what's available to everyone," Cohen said.

When asked about the difference between courtesy and patronizing a handicapped person, Cohen said, "Always offer to help but don't be offended if refused. People have varying levels of independence—if one handicapped person refuses help, one should not be hesitant to offer aid to another handicapped person.

Hasbrouck agreed with Cohen's statements and added that she is offended when her judgement is questioned: she can cross a street without help and is taken aback when someone says, "Do you think you should do that?" She does not utilize the van service to get around campus; however, she does need readers for two courses. Although Amy found readers herself, Residential Life finds volunteers for blind students.

Amy attended public school in Amherst and has always competed with "normal" people. "Many people don't know I'm blind for awhile—once they figure it out, they'll usually shy away. That is partially my fault, because I'm not supportive and people are afraid to ask questions," she said.

Hasbrouck said she is just beginning to learn how to help people feel comfortable with her.

Officials seek crash cause

MEXICO CITY (AP) — Mexican aviation investigators say their investigation of Wednesday's Western Airlines DC-10 crash here centers on why the pilot used a runway he had been told was closed.

But the investigators, who asked not to be identified, said they are not ruling out what could be other, still undetermined causes for the crash, which killed 72 of the 89 occupants of the jetliner and three persons on the ground.

Engineer Mario Aguilar of the airport chief's office said "23-Left (the closed runway) is definitely closed. None of its systems are functioning, not even the runway border lights or the runway approach lights. Only 23-Right has them right now."

Phone operator 'sells' calls

NEW YORK (AP) — A college switchboard operator is accused of bilking the telephone company of more than $1 million over four years by selling cut-rate overseas calls that avoided the billing process.

Robert Dunlap, 36, of Manhattan, allegedly netted $100,000 from the scheme which employed several persons to sell the cut-rate calls to businessmen.

Humpback whales in court

BOSTON (AP) — Humpback and right whales had their day in court yesterday as environmentalists argued that federal officials have not proven offshore oil exploration safe for the endangered species that feed in the Georges Bank.

"The National Marine Fisheries Service believes there is insufficent information to determine if the lease sale constitutes a threat to the species," argued Douglas Foy, an attorney representing the Conservation Law Foundation of New England.

Congress urged to approve $1.5 billion Chrysler loan

By GLENN RITT
Associated Press

WASHINGTON - The Carter administration went to the rescue of financially staggering Chrysler Corp. yesterday, urging Congress to approve up to $1.5 billion in loan guarantees for the nation's No. 3 automaker.

Treasury Secretary G. William Miller said the administration decided to go ahead with the bailout, the largest ever for a U.S. corporation, even though it disagrees philosophically with the notion of direct government intervention in private enterprise.

"This is a unique situation ... that stands on its own merits," Miller said. "The alternative costs are more onerous to our country than the risk of loan guarantees."

The administration aim is to head off a collapse that could result in widespread layoffs and pose another major headache for an already-troubled economy.

The plan sent to Congress would double the $750 million that the administration previously indicated was the most it would support for Chrysler, the nation's No. 3 automaker.

Under the plan, Chrysler would be required to raise an additional $1.5 billion from private sources before it is assured the government loan guarantees.

Analysts believe that without larger loan guarantees, the nation's No. 3 automaker would be forced into bankruptcy, Miller said.

He said such a collapse would "affect the stability of the (nation's) overall economic outlook" and bring the risk of "substantial unemployment (and) economic disruption.

In New York, Chrysler chairman Lee A. Iacocca told reporters he was "delighted with the action" and considered it "a vote of confidence we needed." The board of directors of the Detroit-based company was meeting in New York.

The bailout proposal was sent to Congress with Miller's strong call that it be enacted this year.

"Each day we delay, the situation gets shakier and you need more money," said Rep. William Moorhead, D-Pa., chairman of the subcommittee considering the bailout.

Moorhead, while saying passage of the bill will be difficult, called the new $1.5 billion sum realistic. That also was Miller's message to the giant automaker.

"This is adequate financing" to return Chrysler to a viable corporation, he told reporters.

Chrysler's disappearance would increase unemployment and welfare payments, reduce federal and local taxes, and force the government to pay out pension guarantees to many autoworkers, Miller said

Graffitti: In the women's room

By CAROLYN MOONEY
Collegian Staff

The writing is on the wall in the second floor women's bathroom of the Student Union Building, and it just may be the most comprehensive, literate and provocative graffiti collection on campus. In fact, Collegian sources say a prominent UMass dean heard about the acclaimed scrawlings, and had the bathroom cleared out so he could look inside.

Absent in the bathroom by the post office are the crude propositions with phone numbers and "Star Trek Lives" of the library stairwells; they have been replaced by a network of political, sexual and emotional philosophies that give each stall its own character. Bartlett Hall's first floor women's bathroom once provided a similar forum/outlet for self-expression, but the stalls have since been cleaned.

One woman's revelation that "The enemy is not men, but the ruling class," prompts another to write, "Women are kept from being free by a world whose reality is defined in male terms and benefits men." Yet another responds, "Maybe it's white middle class women who are feminists and push for Affirmative Action to get jobs as executives, etc. Meanwhile, what's being done for poor women?" The discussion sparked by this connection of class with sexism spreads to cover a whole wall.

In one of several feminist stalls, a writer who asserts that "There are only two things wrong with men—everything they do, and everything they say," is told she is "a very bitter person." Another responds, "If every group that's ever been oppressed...held on to their justified prejudices, this whole world would fall apart," bringing another topic, racism, up for debate.

In the sexual preference stall, a self-proclaimed bisexual calls for, "some answers. Am I the only freak that believes bisexuality is the perfectly honest way of being???Huh?" The responses are open and honest: "I'm straight, but sometimes I envy you for having a desire I don't—I feel maybe I'm missing out in some ways...Keep on loving."

But perhaps this woman has the real answer: "Lesbianism? Celibacy? Heterosexuality? Fivesomes? Who gives a shit what kind of sex you enjoy? Live and have sex, and please don't make judgements."

SGA disputes Senate post

By ED LEVINE
Collegian Staff

The rejection of the appointment of Jon Hensleigh as Student Attorney General by the Undergraduate Student Senate Wednesday night appears to be more than a rejection of Hensleigh. The Senate's action was in reality a rejection of the co-president's choice, who was not a favorite of a political faction within the Senate.

The Attorney General is supposed to be a non-political position. The appointment of Ann Bolger to the position last April was also vetoed by the senate because some members of the body felt Bolger had been too close, both politically and personally, to Student Government Association co-presidents Rich LaVoice and Brian Burke.

Both Hensleigh and Bolger were opposed in their bids for the position by the Third World Caucus. The caucus, apparently, opposed the two because their candidate, Julie Robertson, was not chosen by Burke and LaVoice. In a commentary which appeared recently in the Collegian Black Affairs Page, Tony Crayton, Director of the Office of Third World Affairs, referred to Robertson as "Attorney General in exile" and urged that she be appointed to the position.

In referring to the appointment of Bolger over Robertson last semester, Crayton said "the only logical choice left was to appoint Julie Robertson. That choice was never considered."

Robertson, however, certainly appears qualified for the postion. She has served in the past as a para-legal intern with the UMass Legal Services Office, a member of the Board of Governors, Student Senate, Senate co-ordinating committee, and the Third World Caucus.

While Robertson appears qualified for the position, both Bolger and Hensleigh appear at least as, if not more, qualified. Bolger served as an intern in the Amherst Law office of Hancock and Shepard, as a student head of residence in John Adams dormitory, as a student advisor for the College of Arts and Sciences Information and Advising Center and earlier, assistant head of residence in Washington dorm.

Hensleigh has had a long career within student Governmnet. He served as an advocate in the judicial system, as Attorney General, co-president of the SGA, and currently as an assistant head of residence in Lewis dormitory.

The search committee, set up to recommend three names to the co-presidents, earlier this week nominated all three, Bolger, Hensleigh, and Robertson, for the position. The candidates were not ranked in order of preference by the committee, as stated in an open letter to the Senate by committee member Beth Rosenberg. Rosenberg outlined the selection process and said "In our first meeting it was voted upon to not rank the candidates."

Two local merchants join student in fundraiser for area youth clubs

By LAURIE FULLERTON
Collegian staff

The Batters Box and Burger King on Rt. 9 will donate a percentage of their earnings to the Boys and Girls Clubs of Amherst in a fundraiser this Sunday from 9:00 AM to 11:00 PM.

These clubs have had their funds cut considerably by the Hampshire United Way and this year they need to raise $18,000 for operating expenses. The Boys and Girls Club is located in a renovated house on Main Street. Their activities run from boxing to pottery. Without the necessary funds the club will be unable to function.

Alan Davis, Assistant manager of the Batters Box said "We heard about the fund cuts and feel that the community should participate anyway they can, we plan to give half of our proceeds to the Clubs."

The entire project started when Mike Stockley, a UMass student, was looking for promotional ideas as an independent study. The Batters Box and Burger King said they would help him out anyway they could.

Meanwhile, members of the Boys Club were asking merchants for help. They combined their ideas and created the fundraiser. Stockley and teammates of the baseball team will be offering batting clinics to all participants. Students and faculty are invited to attend.

Mental Health services mostly women

By DEBBIE COHEN
Collegian Staff

Women seek help for personal problems far more often than men do, according to various mental health and counseling services at UMass.

However, women do not require more help than men, nor do they have more problems, said spokespersons at these services. Rather, women traditionally have been, and still are more open in asking for assistance in times of trouble.

Psychologists in the services speculate that the imbalance of women to men in counseling is due to the still common assumptions that women are less inhibited in expressing personal concerns than are men, and that our society permits women to ask for help more easily than it does men.

The three main personal counseling services available on campus are The Mental Health Division of the University Health Services, The Psychological Services Center and the Everywoman's Center. The resources at each vary, but all offer help to troubled women.

The Mental Health Division, located in Hills North, is the primary counseling and psychological treatment facility for UMass students, faculty and their dependents. The division provides mostly short-term individual, group, and couples therapy on a once-a-week basis. Clients may either call for an appointment or attend the walk-in service from 1 to 3 p.m. each week day. The division also maintains a 24-hour emergency service.

The 19-member staff, nine of which are women, consists of psychiatric social workers, clinical psychologists, psychiatrists, psychology interns and graduate social work interns.

According to staff psychologist Norma Johnson, the therapy practiced there is verbal; it is a process of learning about oneself through talking. The staff member tries to help the clients see the cause of their problem and redirect them in a more personally satisfying way.

Johnson said that women graduate students constitute the largest group of those who seek help at Mental Health. Although statistics are not broken down by sex, she said that she thinks that more undergraduate women than men use the service.

The majority of the problems people have, she said, usually have to do with relationships. Depression is the second most common area of concern, followed by general identity problems.

Johnson said that there are a growing number of women who "really need to talk about the conflict between recently acquired values of going out into the world and having a job, and the internal values that all women have been brought up with." Johnson said while a woman puts pressure on herself to do well in a career, she must also deal with the traditional pressures to be a good wife and mother.

Many women who call for an appointment request a woman therapist, Johnson said. She suggested that this

Black Affairs

From the Editors

Three articles?...influencing the issue

Despite overwhelming support for the three black women involved in the Russell's incident and in spite of the fact that evidence so far points in their favor, the Collegian continues to run articles supporting Russell's side of the story. Perhaps their reason for doing this is to take an impartial stance. But in so doing the Collegian is in fact defeating their own purpose and have so far neglected the other side of the story.

In three separate articles on Oct. 26, Oct. 31 and Nov. 1 the Collegian has gone the same route of interviewing William Russell's owner of the liquor store. These articles all attempted to blur the facts surrounding the case and to undermine the support of the Defense Committee. They consistently stated that Ada Griffin said she had not given her version of the incident to anyone and was not sure how the Amherst Defense Committee received their information.

On Tuesday, Oct. 30, two editorials appeared with readers relating similiar incidents. Russell's immediate reaction was to withdraw his advertising from the Collegian. However, the Collegian never informed the public about this and instead two days later an article appeared giving his side of the story. Perhaps their motive for this action deserves to be questioned. Russell will continue his advertising next week as usual. It seems that the monetary side of the Collegian could not bite the hand that feeds them, no matter if that hand belongs to a creature that seems to have no humanity.

The primary witness to the Russell's incident has virtually been ignored by the Collegian and other publications. Janet Kinane, a Mount Holyoke College student was on the scene and verified the version given by the Defense Committee. She took photos of the incident, one which was run in Nummo News on Oct. 29. The rest of her film was destroyed by unknown causes.

"Opinions vary on incidents at liquor store", "Russell denies customer charges" and "Incident at Russell's remains hazy issue" are the headlines of the Collegian's articles! All of these headlines show the Collegian's intention of blurring the facts surrounding the Russell's incident. Perhaps it would behoove the Collegian to gather their facts together on both sides before they begin to run such articles and headlines.

In conclusion, all of these events all lead to one conclusion. There is an ever-increasing need for black media in this community. One cannot rely on receiving full accounts of racial events in the media now present. The full story is only received by reading other publications, those who are not guided by the allmighty dollar, but rather they who are more interested in the advancement and progress of Third World people.

Blacks in unions

By NORMAN HILL
Executive Director
A. Philip Randolph Institute

Economists and other scholars have always differed over the consequences of trade unionism for black workers. Some academics, especially conservative economists, have attempted to prove that unions harm blacks by restricting entry into skilled trades, by openly discriminating against non-whites, by scaring off new businesses with high wages, and by provoking long and costly strikes. Under close scrutiny, however, none of these charges have much credibility.

A recently-published article, "The Two Faces of Unionism" by Richard L. Freeman and James L. Medoff offers some new insights into the black-labor relationship. The article, which appears in the Fall issue of The Public Interest, convincingly challenges the notion that unions are enemies of black people. Indeed, Freeman and Medoff, both of them faculty members at Harvard University, present some solid data indicating that union membership is a valuable asset for black workers.

Increased income and superior fringe benefits are the most important advantages enjoyed by black union members. For example, blacks who work in unionized plants earn approximately 35 percent more than their counterparts in non-union shops. And, as Freeman and Medoff point out, the fringe benefits of union members are worth 14 percent more than the benefits offered to non-union workers. The biggest differences in fringe benefits are in life and health insurance coverage (48 percent more for union members), pensions (21 percent higher), and vacation pay (19 percent more).

Trade unions also help to narrow the income gap between black and white workers. Whereas non-union blacks earned 15 percent less than non-union whites, the gap between black and white union members in blue-collar occupation was 9 percent.

Freeman and Medoff explain this lower black/white gap by pointing out that "unionization reduces discriminatory differences within organized firms through the standard-rate and promotion by seniority policies." In other words, union contracts which specify wage rates for each job, and which establish a clear seniority system for advancement effectively prevent employers from discriminating by race.

Moreover, black trade unionists who encounter racial discrimination at the hands of an employer can challenge their bosses through the grievance process outlined in the union contract. Blacks in non-union firms, however, must turn to outside legal action which can be both costly and slow.

In light of all this, it seems to me that the mutually beneficial relationship between blacks and trade unions will become stronger in the coming years as even more blacks enter unions with the hope of improving their economic position, and of protecting their jobs. After all, black workers, even without reading the statistics in the Freeman-Medoff article, have long understood trade unionism: they know that it pays—and pays handsomely—to have a union card.

For Whites Only

One day last week, I walked into the Union Record Store in the Student Union. I went over to look in the section of Black Classical Music "JAZZ" and what I saw I would not like to believe. There were less than a handful of albums in that section.

The college community has always been a haven for people who like to listen to Black Classical Music. A student record store should have a wider selection of this music. Not to feature artists such as John Coltrane, Miles Davis, Billie Holiday, Art Blakey, Max Roach, Marion Brown, and Archie Shepp, and many more artists widely listened to throughout the world is sad.

That section of music should not be called JAZZ, and instead should be called another term such as Black Classical Music.

By not having an in-depth selection of Black Classical Music many people are prevented from purchasing this material, making the circle of individuals who listen to Black Classical Music a little smaller. If less people listen, then less is requested, both on radio and in concert. I think that there should be definite moves made to provide a wide selection of this music.

Tarzan on Racism

This is not meant to be funny. It's just not easy to pinpoint racism in the United States, especially with reverse racism flying around. I guess Afro-Americans are running around exploiting and oppressing white people. Seems to me that the planet has gone totally beserk.

Imagine all the Senators, Representatives, Presidents, Cabinet members, and business executives being black, Hispanic or Asian. Whites are 10 percent of the population. Any whites are token whites to meet the Affirmative Action requirements. Then the blacks would get carried away, talking about how dirty and ignorant the white niggers are. I could hear them now "why don't they take baths. Why don't they work for a living. We built up this country, and now they want to take it away."

Then the whites would start organizing and shouting "white power" and claiming that blacks are racist. Around every tree lurks a white saying "racism". The blacks, being intimidated and oppressed, would start screaming reverse racism. "Now the whites are taking over the country." Then the blacks will start saying "what the heck we got going on here Martha. Are whites taking over the country. Give a white an inch and they'll take a mile."

The illustration is indicative of how crazy the situation is, unless there are no innocent, conscientious, anti-racist whites actively combating their own evils of their own society. Undoubtedly there are whites like this, but when the status quo white is racist, they are responsible for the evils done by the US government in the name of the anti-communist crusade, cooping governments all over the Third World, and druging and bombing the Asians back to kingdom zero. The fact that they don't take the blame for this stuff shows the level of insantify we are dealing with. After all, what is this, a democracy?

Tarzan use to crack me up. Tarzan has proven to me how whites think of color. I'm not accusing Tarzan of racism, but I think Americans have some kind of hang up about color, to say the least. I just knew Africans were white. Cheta was the second smartest animal on the show, with the exception of Tarzan. Tarzan was running around saving the lives of all the Africans. I guess Americans would have lost all contact with reality seeing a black Tarzan, not that the skin color makes any difference of course.

But Tarzan was cool. He was white, noble and shared the views of the natives. He illustrated that whites could live in the jungle, as far as the movies go. I'm not denying the greatness of America, but its insanity should not be ignored either, like so many other things are.

New pro-life group forms in Northampton

By DONNA SULLIVAN
Collegian Staff

Despite the prevailing pro-abortion sentiment, a group of pro-lifers has been flourishing in the Pioneer Valley. Massachusetts Citizens for Life has about 13 chapters in the region—the newest being a chapter recently established in Northampton.

The objectives of Mass. Citizens are two-fold, according to regional coordinator George Wilson. "Our purpose is to foster respect for life from conception to natural death and to educate people about the facts of abortion and the stages of fetal development," he said.

Mass. Citizens take active role in legislative activity. According to Wilson, the group informs legislators of its views and tries to persuade them to vote pro-life. "We also encourage individuals to write to their senators and congressmen urging them to vote pro-life," he said.

The group occasionally pickets a visiting politician. "If it is not too offensive, we might be picketing. We want to show the congressman or senator how we feel on the issue and we want the people to know how their legislators feel...and what their voting record is," Wilson said.

"(Senator Edward) Kennedy is a prime target of ours," said John Day of the Ludlow chapter. "He is a strong abortion supporter."

Day spoke of what is called the Kennedy syndrome—when a politician is "personally opposed to abortion BUT..."

The group recently held a counter-demonstration at Congressman Silvio Conte's office. According to Wilson, the pro-abortion people were picketing his office for their cause and Mass. Citizens wanted to show their support for the Congressman who has consistently voted pro-life.

An Education Committee headed by coordinator Susan Szetela is a vital part of the Mass. Citizens for Life. According to Szetela, there is an Educational Speakers Bureau composed of about 30 people that speaks on behalf of the right to life. The bureau uses slides, films, and speakers to educate the public on what happens to the baby when aborted, the beauty of an unborn child and number of abortions, Szetela said.

The group sets up booths and displays at various schools and health fairs throughout different communities. According to Day, Mass. Citizens exerts a great deal of effort each year on a booth at the Eastern States Exposition in Springfield. They distribute informational pamphlets and this year displayed models depicting the stages of development of an unborn child.

"We have found that women do not know what the facts about abortion are," Wilson said. "They do not know that life begins at conception. We would like to see as many women as possible know the facts," he said.

According to Szetela, the group is also anti-euthanasia and anti-infanticide. Newborn infants with defects are being allowed to cry themselves to death, according to Szetela. They are not fed and not taken care of at all. The parents are given this choice if a baby is born with Down's Syndrome or with some type of severe retardation, she said.

The group was formed, Wilson said, as a result of the 1973 Supreme Court decision to legalize abortion. Each year, on January 22, the anniversary of that decision, people from all over the country converge in Washington D.C. to march and visit their various congressmen. The Pioneer Valley Region sends four to seven busloads of people to join the 70,000 to 100,000 others.

The Mass. Citizens for Life is composed of about 60,000 members, 1,400 of whom are in the Pioneer Valley Region. Members range in age from early twenties to late seventies but most are about 40 or over, Wilson said.

Each year, the Mass. Citizens hold a fundraiser called the Mother's Day Dinner. "We have had people picket our dinner," Day said, "But they have the freedom of expression."

The newly formed Northampton chapter, according to chairman Allan Zuchowski, is still in the process of organizing. The first meeting drew about 25 people and a second meeting is planned for November 16 in the basement of St. Mary's Church in Northampton.

"The church is letting us use the basement but we are a non-sectarian group," Zuchowski said, "we are currently forming membership and education committees and trying to get as many members as we can."

Senate car in accident

Connecticut state police yesterday reported that a student senate auto pool car being driven by representatives from Nummo News left the scene of an accident it was involved in north of Hartford.

Trooper John Gale said the minor collision occurred yesterday morning on I-91 southbound near exit 34. He said the senate car, a red LTD, collided with the rear of a truck near a construction site.

Gale said drivers of the car failed to give their names, addresses, and registration to the operator of the truck, as they are required by law to do. The car was not carrying registration papers, he said.

NOW YOU CAN EARN OVER $6,500 WITH ARMY ROTC.

Before you graduate from college! Because now, you can combine service in the Army Reserve or National Guard with Army ROTC. It's called the Simultaneous Membership Program (SMP). And, depending on your academic year when you enter, SMP can help you earn over $6,500.

Here's how it works. If you qualify and a vacancy is available, you become a member of an Army Reserve or National Guard unit as an officer trainee and, at the same time, enroll in the Army ROTC advanced course at your college. Your Reserve or Guard membership will pay you at the minimum level of Sergeant E-5, and you'll receive $100 a month during the regular school year as an Army ROTC advanced course cadet.

At the end of your second year of advanced ROTC, you'll be commissioned a second lieutenant and, assuming there's a vacancy, serve with a Guard or Reserve unit while you complete the requirements for your college degree. Upon graduation, you may continue service with a Guard or Reserve unit while pursuing your civilian career, or you can, if you prefer, compete for active duty as an Army officer.

So if you'd like to earn over $6,500 while you're still in college, get into SMP. Because SMP can help you do it. You can bank on it!

For further information, contact the Professor of Military Science at your school.

SATF fiasco

2 involved students contend SGA should control dollars

UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS · SGA

STUDENT GOVERNMENT ASSOCIATION
STUDENT SENATE
AMHERST 01003 (413) 545-0341
UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS

After reading Dean of Students William Field's October 25 letter to the Collegian entitled "Paper Clips to Millions," we experienced our usual bewilderment concerning his motives for the actions which he so vehemently advocates. His all-too-characteristic contortions of the facts, concerning such issues as SATF activities, the Attorney General selection process, and the Student Government Association experiences with the Collegian, contribute greatly to confusing the main issue: who should have control over the Student Activities Tax revenues?

We believe that the students, through the Student Government Association, should retain their current control over the distribution of revenues derived from this tax. It is a student tax, levied by the SGA, for the funding of student programs and services. Who is better qualified to determine exactly which programs and services provide for the diverse interests of all members of the student community? The students or the administration?

We believe that the administration has little basis for their current policies which seem to be leading toward their total control over the disbursement of SATF revenues. That however, is not the point of this particular letter. This letter intends to question Dean Field's knowledge of the facts which he has brought up in order to substantiate his claims.

In his October 25 letter, Dean Field states: "He (Joel Weissman) fails to mention the recent audit of the Student Cooperative Record Store, which revealed that $20,000, which went through management hands, was never seen again." Although this statement may seem sound, at first glance, when one knows the facts of the specific case involved, it begins to fall apart.

The incident to which Dean Field is referring concerns the Union Record Service, which was a campus record store and a Campus Center Board of Governors project. Substantial amounts of money were mishandled by the management of that store, and it subsequently folded. The URS, which is largely responsible for the deficit in question, was a revenue-generating project of the Board of Governors. The Union Record Service never had any relationship to the Coop Collective, which is the unifying group for student-run businesses and services on campus.

Dean Field's attempt to equate the past fiscal responsibilities of the URS with any "cooperative record store" is obviously an invalid one. This attempt represents a backhanded slam at the extensive network of coops which exist on the UMass campus. These coops have been the target of much administration harassment, almost since their inception.

Union Records Unlimited, which was organized to replace URS, is a student-run and student-staffed business. Since its establishment in the spring of 1979, URU has enjoyed an acceptable level of success, and has implemented a sound fiscal policy, under the auspices of the Economic Development Office, an office of the Student Government Association.

Incidentally, an audit conducted by the EDO in April and May of 1979 showed "a net loss from operation of (URS) of $11,852.15." This figure represents a discrepancy of over $8,000 between Dean Field's stated estimate of "20,000," and the EDO audit figure quoted above.

Union Records Unlimited is a new member of the Coop Colllective, and has participated in its functions since the beginning of this semester. Any attempt by Dean Field to link the current operation of Union Records Unlimited with the past operation of a completely separate business (URS), can only be viewed as a lack of proper knowledge of the facts in this particular case, and not as a question of semantics. We are concerned that this lack of knowledge may extend to other areas which Dean Field has seen fit to address.

A further comment concerning Dean Field's letter must be addressed to his statement that he wonders "for what purpose a large stable of student bureaucrats is maintained?" We can only respond that the reason is to administer the programs which have been set up in response to demonstrated student needs. Isn't this the same purpose for which "the large stable" of professional "bureaucrats are maintained" at Whitmore?

In closing, we would like to pose an additional question to Dean Field. There is an old addage that asks: How can one person effectively serve two masters? Perhaps William Field has found the answer. He must have, for he attempts to serve the interests of the students as Dean of Students, while attempting to serve the interests of the townspeople as Town Moderator.

On inventing square corn

Jack Gallagher

We couldn't, after all, just sit back and let the Japanese invent the square watermelon.

Especially since that race which is known for its transistor radios and television sets had received so much press for inventing that useless square fruit, (though it does, granted, stack well in the refrigerator), we had, to use a useless metaphor, to do something to turn the tide; to reap our own harvest, so to speak.

Further, what almost everyone close to the situation failed to realize is that that watermelon, which is produced in Asia, is unnatural, a man-made phenomenon.

Therefore, because the natural-unnatural distinction has been advanced, our intention of development, as the scientists would have it, which, it should be divulged, is vegetable rather than fruit, (However, is a tomato a fruit or a vegetable? I have never been convinced, irresolutely either way.), is natural.

The Japanese, you see, get their watermelons to grow square because they grow them in a cage; the cage forming the watermelon, rather than the watermelon forming the cage. (Thus existence does precede essence, in the case of square watermelons, anyway.)

However, our invention or development is natural, in that we don't use a cage, or a cardboard box, for that matter, to make it grow like we want it to.

We are less mechanical, and, thus, more sophisticated, in our techniques: We recombine genes instead.

Our product is, of course, the square ear of corn.

Imagine: a meal of apple pie, Coca Cola and square corn at the ballpark, bus terminal, laudromat. Imagine the airline steward serving you a square ear of corn with your one and one-half ounce nip of gin. But don't imagine for too long.

For many years, they couldn't serve corn on trains or planes because it would roll off of your plate, (unless you were eating canned niblets), but now they can.

You can thank Dr. Walton Galinat, who, by the way, is a professor of Environmental Science specializing in plant genes for your school, the University of Massachusetts.

Galinat, who developed the square ear, as it will be called from here on in, sometime over the summer, has been working with corn for about 40 years, from his early high school years in Connecticut. He said, from a telephone in his greenhouse at the Waltham Substation of the UMass Agricultural Department, that he used to live near a substation in Connecticut, working there part time.

And, from those beginnings, Galinat went to the University of Wisconsin, where he studied more about corn, graduated, and enrolled at Harvard University, where he received his doctorate.

The reason why you haven't heard about the doctor and his development, is because he lives too close for you to care about him.

Somehow, it doesn't seem all that exotic that someone working in Waltham has invented the square ear. But Japan is something else; thus the square-watermelon publicity.

When you think of someone working in Waltham and developing something new, you think of an electrical engineer fooling-around with a micro-circuit on Rt. 128, dodging automobiles and electrical impulses, concurrently.

But really, speaking of corn and scientists, in a serious vein, I can't think of anyone else, besides Galinat, who is so accomplished. Take the science of psychology, for instance, and compare it to plants and genes.

Both involve traits, but Gordon Allport, a noted trait theorist in the field of psychology, could never "stabilize" a trait as Galinat has in developing the square ear.

Galinat says corn "is my kind of hobby."

The Japanese cage watermelons is total seriousness.

Collegian loses credibility with 'inane racial babbling'

To the Editor:

After reading the 10/31/79 issue of the Collegian, I have come to the conclusion that this publication has all of the journalistic credibility of the typical UMass bathroom wall. I am disgusted by the fact, that you continually print the inane babblings of a few racial fanatics, who constantly harp on the same irrelevent racial topics, written with the political tact of a typical seventh-grader.

I believe that I speak for the vast majority of students, when I say that I neither care, nor want to hear about these issues, because they do not concern my daily existence at this university in the least bit. These people do have a right to air their views publicly, but this newspaper is certainly not the place to do it.

James Lewis' editorial on the 31st is a classic case in point. This editorial was a tedious, poorly organized collection of half-truths, whose appearance in the Collegian should be a tremendous embarrassment to you as editors.

Recent pro-Zionist article 'heartwarming, encouraging'

To the Editor:

Jim Moran's article defending the Jews against the recent upsurge of Black and anti-Semetic and anti-Zionist (if such a distinction can be made) sentiment was heartwarming and encouraging. I would like to make public the source of this "informative" little booklet which the Iranian-Muslim students claim is not anti-Zionist. It was taken directly from a newspaper called the National Vanguard, a harmful, racist, neo-Nazi publication, put out for the benefit of all those enlightened individuals that subscribe to the philosophy of Nazism.

the candidates arises from the controversy surrounding last year's committee recommendations which led to the appointment of Bolger. Apparently some members of the Senate, in rejecting Bolger, had felt Robertson was ranked number one by the search committee, and Robertson herself was quoted as saying "I did not want to see Bolger raked over the coals, but the fact that the number one candidate recommended by the search committee did not get the appointment is highly unfair."

In a recent Collegian editorial, Scott Sherman, a student judge and a member of the search committee denied the ranking of the candidates and said Robertson was chosen as the third name after the committee's two favorite candidates were chosen.

Before the appointment of Hensleigh Wednesday night, some members of the senate had asked for a ranking of the candidates. Speaker David Barenberg prohibited the action saying it wasn't part of the original purpose of the committee. One member of the search committee said the voting for the candidates in the committee, which would have been used to rank the candidates if they had chosen to do so, placed Hensleigh first, followed by Bolger and then Robertson.

Burke and LaVoice, in choosing their candidates had what appears to be a difficult choice. Bolger had been defeated by the senate previously and has been assumed by some members of the senate to be tied to LaVoice, politically. Robertson, with her public support by the Third World Caucus could also be seen as a political figure. As a result Burke and LaVoice chose Hensleigh.

★ Mental health

might in part reflect the women's movement in that women are reaching out for other women.

Mental Health services are prepaid by the Student Health fee, and are also covered by the Valley Health Plan. A charge of $12.50 ($32.50 if the client has no supplemental insurance) per hour may be assessed if the number of therapy sessions during the academic year exceeds 15. According to Johnson, the average number of sessions required is five or six.

As an alternative to the Mental Health Division, people seeking help can go to the Psychological Services Center (PSC) located in Tobin Hall. PSC, a training clinic for doctoral students in clinical psychology, serves the surrounding area as well as the campus community.

According to staff psychologist Dr. Richard Haglin, students account for only about 15 percent of the clientele. He said students routinely go to the Mental Health Division. Students go to PSC either because they were referred there or because of personal reasons, he said.

Halgin said the staff consists of 54 therapists, 28 of whom are women, and seven liscenced psychologists. A person in need generally calls up and is assigned to a therapist. If it is an emergency situation, the person will be asked to come in immediately.

Halgin cited depression and life adjustment difficulties as the most common mental health problems encountered at PSC.

Halgin estimated that approximately 65-70 percent of those who seek help at PSC are women. He said many women's problems involve struggles about sex-role issues, and include sexual or emotional abuse or harassment.

Approximately 25 percent of the women who seek assistance at PSC request a woman therapist, he said. Moreover, there are more men who request women therapists than there are women who request men therapists. Halgin suggested that this cold be due to society's feeling that women are more capable than men of being sympathetic and less controlling.

People who choose to go to PSC are charged according to their ability to pay. However, those who are referred there from Mental Health do not have to pay.

In addition to PSC and the Mental Health Division, women have a third option in the counseling service at the Everywoman's Center. This resource, solely for women, provides a staff of one supervisor and five counselors, all of whom are women.

The Everywoman's Center, located in Wilder Hall, offers short-term (6-12 weeks) individual and couple counseling in a variety of areas concerning women. They also provide a referral service for women who are looking for therapists.

Women seeking assistance can either call for an appointment or can meet with someone during walk-in hours, which are 9 to 11 a.m. on Monday, 3 to 5 p.m. on Wednesday, 11:30 to 1:30 p.m. on Thursday and 11 to 1 p.m. on Friday. The counseling is free.

In addition to these three services on campus, women in need of assistance can seek help at several other places in the area, including CIRCA, a feminist counseling center in Northampton, and Elysium, also in Northampton.

Around campus

Abortion rights meeting Sat.

An Abortion Rights Conference will be held Saturday, Nov. 3, from 9 a.m. to 2 p.m. at Mary Wooley Hall, Mount Holyoke College.

The keynote speech will be given at 9 a.m. by Micki Nichols Gamble of Planned Parenthood, Boston. A film and seminars on reproductive rights will follow.

A cold cuts buffet will be served, and admission is free. For information call 584-9203.

Ravi Shankar gives concert

Renowned Indian sitar-player Ravi Shankar will give a concert Nov. 4 at 8:15 in the Amherst College new gym.

Also a political figure, Shankar is best known for his contributions to the Concert for Bangla Desh in New York City in 1971.

As a composer, Shankar has written extensively, including pieces for the ballet and film in the United States, Canada, Europe and India. He has also written a Concerto for Sitar and Orchestra on commission from the London Symphony.

Shankar's music became known in the United States in the 60's. Since then he has frequently given concerts and lectures at North American colleges and universities.

Alla Rakha, the tabla virtuoso, will accompany Shankar as he has for many years.

Tickets are $3 for students with identification and $5 for the general public. Seating is on the bleachers and the floor and the audience is invited to bring pillows.

FX plays at the Blue Wall

Local listening and dancing band, FX, will play Saturday night from 9-1 in the Campus Center's Blue Wall bar.

FX is a combination of rock, jazz and progressive styles. The four-member band plays guitars, keyboards, bass, drums and percussion.

Students under 20 are also permitted in the Blue Wall. A separate area has been designated for minors and non-alcoholic refreshments are also sold. A Top of the Campus sticker is required for admission.

New musical on sex roles

"Viva Reviva", a new musical by award-winning poet-playright Eve Merriam and composer Amy Rubin will be presented Nov. 5, 6, and 7 at Hampden Center for Performing Arts in the Southwest Residential Area.

The play is about stereotyped sex roles and attempts to erase sexist misconceptions of the past.

The purpose of this performance by the City Studio Theater is to elicit feedback from the audience concerning the issues raised in "Viva Reviva" before the play opens in the theatre in Northampton. Following the performances, director Margaret Van Sant and members of the case will discuss the play with the audience.

Tickets for the Hampden performances are $2. Performances are at 8 p.m.

Classical guitarist at AC

Classical guitarist Janet Marlow will give a free concert Saturday night at 8:15 in Buckley Recital Hall, Amherst College. And prior to the concert today at 2, Marlow will conduct a Master Class for classical guitarists in the College's Music Center, room seven.

The concert and class are free and open to the public. Following the class, Marlow will present an informal discussion about her instrument, the ten-string guitar.

Collins holds office hours

Representative James G. Collins, D-Amherst, will hold his regular monthly office hours tomorrow from 11 a.m. to 12 noon in Campus Center 815.

Citizens can meet with Collins without an appointment to discuss issues or problems which affect them.

A box office smash; a box score crash

By FRANK PAPSADORE
Collegian Staff

The New England Patriots never cease to amaze me, or maybe the problem is that they always do seem to amaze me. In the aftermath of their 31-26 loss to the struggling Baltimore Colts (Bert Jones or no Bert Jones), I think the best way to classify the New England ball club is in the words of Boston Globe sportswriter Michael Madden, "The team that always seems to be almost great."

Patriots fans everywhere can feel the truth of that statement from their pennant waving fingertips to their frosty, Schaeffer Stadium, aluminum seated buns. It seems the whole Patriot organization is primarily concerned with the utter confusion of their fans. How can they come off of a brilliant second half win over the Miami Dolphins, the Patriots biggest rival and stiffest competition for the AFC title, only to be utterly embarrassed by a shaky, inexperienced, rookie infested ball club such as the previously 2-6 Baltimore Colts? There are many excuses and many opinions. My opinion is that I don't think the New England Patriots are the hyped-up, super-duper football team that they are made out to be. Don't get me wrong, the Patriots have some of the best individual talent in all of professional football, some real box-office smashes. But the key two words there are individuals and box office. Until the Patriots learn to play football, they'll be struggling endlessly for a world title much in the same manner of their Boston baseball counterparts. But of major concern to myself, is the way Boston sports teams seem to draw amazing ticket sales, win or lose, at home or on the road. And it seems to me that this has become the most important interest to Boston front offices.

Being a journalism major, I have learned about the power and profit of these press relations, and how they sell their product. In order to sell, you must have something that someone wants to buy. The New England Patriots do it by drafting a flashy college player and letting him strut his stuff, maybe at best five or six plays a game, and then end up getting burned on the long pass when there was no one there to help or by fumbling when someone has missed a block. But it's those flashy plays that everyone notices and talks about. And it's what everyone talks about that makes people buy season tickets. And it's when people buy season tickets that Boston front office personnel are happy.

Every high school football coach and locker room lawyer knows the importance of team football, yet the Patriots have seemingly eluded this concept. It takes an entire roster to win football games consistently, not just eleven, or especially not six, or or five or three. Steve Grogan entertained with the Stanley Morgan Show the first half on Sunday, and then came back with the Best of Harold Jackson Show in the second half, either completely forgetting or completely refusing to recognize his running backs, or his tight end. The offensive show lacked any kind of versatility or imagination exception except in a couple of tremendously unsuccessful reverses. This type of individualistic play is not the play of a leader and especially not the play of a winner.

But let's not blame the offense entirely for the poor showing Sunday. Surely 26 points is enough for a team with the statistically toughest defense in the NFL to win. But again, they did not play as a team. There were missed tackles and missed assignments, and this usually cohesive unit, (they do play better team ball than the offense, but most defensive units do), seemed to be chasing people all day instead of stopping them. It brings to mind an interview I heard Raymond Clayborn give saying that he doesn't even notice that Mike Haynes is at the other corner during a game, that he is concerned with doing his own job. The most important aspect of a zone defense is that the four defensive backs work together and with the linebackers during passing as well as running plays. When this team play is abandoned, so is a potent defense, such was the case Sunday when Baltimore rolled up 433 yards total offense.

I'm sick and tired of hearing the New England Patriots being called by every sports announcer in the country, and it was no different this Sunday, as "The Big-Play Offense, or The Big Play Defense" team. All it is is that flashy burst of stardom I mentioned earlier. If New England doesn't settle down to do some thinking and play some serious, organized team football, their chances of winning a world title are about as slim as a team like Pittsburgh losing it. And the not-so-funny thing about it is that New England has as much talent as Pittsburgh. Their only, and most important difference is organization and execution. Pittsburgh's front office sells tickets by winning. New England sells theirs by almost winning.

Women harriers in Easterns

By JIM GRAHAM
Collegian Staff

The UMass women's cross-country team will travel to Westchester State, Penn. this Sunday to compete in the Eastern Championships. The Minutewomen will be competing in the championship division in hopes of being one of four teams to qualify for the Nationals.

The top three teams to go to the Nationals will most likely be Penn. State, Maryland and Princeton. UMass is one of six favored teams competing for the fourth spot and a trip to Florida to compete in the Nationals. "If we run like we did in the New Englands, we'll be fourth. Everyone will run well and we've got no injuries. If we're not ready now, we'll never be ready," Coach Pete Pfitzinger said.

The Minutewomen will be running the same top seven runners who led the team to a victory in the New Englands two weeks ago. Competing will be Judy McCrone, Cathy Petrick, Julie Burke, Linda Welzel, Tricia Moores, 'Dill' Wilson, and Robyn Dally. "They're really psyched up. Julie Burke and Linda Welzel will run well since they've improved so much. Our top five will run under 18:30," Pfitzinger said.

More than 30 top teams will be competing on the 5000 meter course in the championship division with UMass.

Stickwomen blank Brown; await regionals seeding

By MIKE ESTRADA
Collegian Staff

Sophomore All-American Judy Strong netted a pair of goals and team scoring leader Laura O'Neil added a goal and assist as the field hockey team helped secure its ranking in the upcoming EAIAW regional tournament, downing Brown 4-0 in Providence on Wednesday.

The shutout lifts the team record to 13-2, with the rankings and pairings for the November 16 tournament to be announced this Sunday. UMass coach Pam Hixon, a member of the tournament committee, said that she does not know where her defending fourth-place nationally ranked team will be seeded, only that it will fall "within the top four."

The tournament organization will be different from last year said Hixon. Only Division 1 teams will be represented in the regionals, doing away with the "satellite" playoffs prior to the finals at Springfield.

Last year UMass travelled to Cortland State College where several schools under Division 1 were involved. This year the top eight teams picked this Sunday will go directly to Springfield for a single-elimination tournament, the top three finishers earning the right to travel to Princeton, N.J. for the nationals.

"The hard part is done," Hixon said. "We've stuck it out this long and made the regionals. But the regional tournament is a whole different season. We'll try to reach another peak for the regionals."

Last year UMass was seeded third in the region but came in fourth at the Springfield tournament. First place Springfield College did not travel to the national tournament at Ellensburg, Wash. because of a lack of funds, allotting a spot for unseeded UMass, which went on to defeat second seeded Temple and capture fourth place in the nation.

UMass takes on the University of Iowa this Sunday at 10 a.m. at NOPE. Hixon explained that the midwestern regional team is the only Division 1 team in Iowa, so it will be beneficial to see what kind of talent another part of the country has to offer.

Three of the top four finishers at Ellenburg last year were from the eastern portion of the country.

If you planned to take in a Minutemen football game this weekend, you had better change your plans. The team is off this week, but will return to action next Saturday, November 10, at Alumni Stadium against the Holy Cross Crusaders.

Intramural swim meet held

By DONNA SULLIVAN
Collegian Staff

The Strokers combined lightning fast swimmers with fancy divers to finish first in a field of five in the intramural co-recreational swim meet held Wednesday in Boyden pool. The Strokers took two firsts and four seconds in swimming events and a first in the diving competition for a total of 41 points.

The Flynn sisters, Aline and Jay, big record setters in last year's intramural swimming competition, helped the Speedos place second with 33 points. The Speedos came in first in three events, each team consisting of one or both of the Flynns.

The Strokers team of Steve Carlson, Trudy Rendall, Bill Tharion, and Lynn Lutz sped through the 200 yard medley for the win. They sent out Lori Levin, Marko Duffy, Betty Carrier, and Bill Tharion for the 100-yard medley and the group was successful, completing the medley in 58.5 seconds for the win.

Dan Peterson and Mary Chaffee did the diving for the Strokers and took a first in some tight competition.

The Speedos finished the 200 yard freestyle with the winning time of one minute and 49.2 seconds. Dale Syphers, Chris Hailer, John Gill and Aline Flynn swam for the Speedos. Their second win came in the 200 yard backstroke when Paul Syphers, Eileen Joyce, Jon Barcelo and Jay Flynn finished in two minutes and 13.8 seconds.

The Speedos ended the meet on a good note taking the last event of the day, the 200 yard breaststroke in two minutes and 59.9 seconds. Swimming for the Speedos were Barcelo, both Flynns and Paul Syphers.

The Nuclear Holocaust came up with one first place in the 100 yard butterfly, one second, and two thirds to place third in the meet with 30 points. For the 100 yard butterfly, the Nukes sent out Mike Rowbotham, Carol Potts, Mike Sweet and Carol Amoroso who completed the event in 59.3 seconds.

John Nunnelly, women's swim team coach, acted as consultant for the event and Ed Lizotte served as director-announcer. Fian Nooijen of the intramural department supervised, and the efforts of the trio made for a successful meet.

Probably the highlight of the evening was the novelty race—a race that won no one any points but gave everyone a good laugh. Four members from each of the five teams swam one length of the pool—clothed in shorts, a shirt and socks. Before the second competitor could start, he/she had to put on the same set of clothing worn by the first and so on.

NORTHAMPTON—The women's volleyball team upended Smith College 15-4, 15-12, 15-12 at Smith last night, improving their record to 17-6 as they get ready for the final games of the season next week.

In game one, the pace was slow, as both teams bumped and passed over the net; no offense was generated by either side. Led by Peggy Barber's serving and Ellen Braun at the net, the Minutewomen overwhelmed Smith with fine spiking and passing, despite good digging by Smith.

The second game featured the Smith backcourt; they held off the UMass offense by digging away potential UMass points. However, Chris Kelly and Ellen Braun kept the Minutewomen from developing any serious problems with key blocks and spikes. Though Smith showed signs of life by leading twice in the game, UMass managed to rally and win.

Smith College continued to play close during the third and final game, as their front court helped them to come back from a 2-9 deficit to tie at nine. At that point, the Minutewomen pulled away, thanks to a team effort led by captain Joyce Gresl, Alison Taylor, Peggy Barber, and Chris Kelly.

"Everybody played well," said UMass coach Elaine Marasco. "It was a good match overall. We're ready to play Tuesday when we face Westfield and Keene State."

Meanwhile, the JV's squeaked by Northeastern University 15-8, 15-8, 12-15, 3-15, 15-9, at NOPE gym also last night.

Booters set for weekend contest with BC Eagles

By DAVE BRADLEY
Collegian Staff

Even Jimmy "the Greek" might have trouble laying odds on tomorrow's men's soccer game against Boston College at 1:00 behind Boyden.

A quick look at the two teams shows UMass, 5-4-2, is ranked twelfth in the News England coaches poll while B.C., 6-5-4, isn't even mentioned. But B.C. can't be considered too much of an underdog because the Eagles have demonstrated talent in tying nationally ranked San Francisco University 0-0, and posting the same shutout scores against Boston University and Babson College, ranked third and eighth in N.E. respectively. B.C.'s record also includes 2-0 wins over the University of New Hampshire and Keene State College, both ranked above UMass in the region.

"UMass is the favorite," said B.C. coach Ben Brewster. "They have a solid team...a lot of good soccer players."

"But if we play the way we can, we can give them a good game," he continued. "I think it will be a good game."

B.C. is not a scoring power. Their leading booter has three of the 14 goals the team has scored all season. But the Eagle defense has allowed only 15 goals in as many games.

UMass has scored 16 goals and allowed 12. Minuteman Wayne Moran leads UMass with six goals and three assists.

Coming off a narrow 1-0 victory over division three Westfield State College Wednesday, UMass tri-captain Mark Vassalotti said the team was "a little sore" after a "really physical" game, but he felt the Minutemen would be ready for B.C.

IM football finals set for conclusion on Monday

By DONNA SULLIVAN
Collegian Staff

The Flakes routed the Indians to advance to the finals in women's intramural football action last night. Led by quarterback Sue Henry and wide receiver Lori Taddeo the Flakes chalked up 22 points while holding the Indians to a mere two.

The Flakes will meet the Pumas who defeated the Mary Lyon Cubs in Wednesday's semi-final match. Both teams will be in keen competition for the first place title. According to Fian Nooijen, a Puma, the two teams have a tendency to meet somewhere along the way.

The Titans took the Co-Recreational title by defeating the Van Meter Northerners 16 to 10 in sudden death overtime. The Northerners stayed alive by scoring a touchdown and completing the two point conversion with just seconds to go. The two teams went into overtime action tied 10 to 10 and the Titans quickly got a touchdown off to triumph.

In men's action, Phi Sigma Kappa edged by Patterson Off to advance to Monday's finals. Quarterback Chris Collins threw a 27 yard touchdown pass to Frank Marshall, the extra point was good, and the score was 7-6.

Patterson Off came back with a touchdown and a successful two point conversion that was called back because of a penalty. The penalty proved fatal as Phi Sig won by a mere point. According to manager Bob Lahey the Phi Sigma defense has not let up a point all season. Their one loss was due to an interception.

Phi Sigma will face Express in the finals. Last night Express squeezed by the Hamlin Howlers 15-12. Express racked up their points when Scott Yanow made a diving catch in the end zone then ran in on a screen pass. Yanow kicked for one extra point and Marc Brown caught a pass for a two point conversion.

The finals will start Monday at 4:30 at the intramural fields.

Red Sox seek pitching in today's free agent draft

BOSTON (AP) — The Boston Red Sox shop for pitching in today's free agent re-entry baseball draft, with an eye on both starters and relievers.

Because of rules against tampering, no names of prospective draftees were divulged by the Red Sox. However, they were known to be interested in left-thanded reliever Al Hrabosky of the Kansas City Royals and right-handed starter Dave Goltz of the Minnesota Twins.

The team is also in the market for a catcher, not knowing whether Carlton Fisk will be able to come back from an elbow injury that limited his playing time last season.

Two Red Sox players have made themselves available to bidders in the draft — first baseman Bob Watson and reserve catcher Bob Montgomery. The New York Yankees are known to be interested in signing Watson, the slugger who was acquired by Boston from the Houston Astros last June.

The Red Sox still consider themselves in the bidding for Watson, however, and can negotiate with him after the draft which begins at 11 a.m. in New York at the Plaza Hotel.

Last year, the Red Sox made offers to several players in the re-entry draft but signed only pitcher Steve Renko, who negotiated his own contract.

The year before, however, Boston signed three free agents including high-priced pitcher Mike Torrez — at $540,000 per season — lefty reliever Tom Burgmeier and infielder Jack Brohamer.

Unsung heroes

There are quite a few sports figures on this campus that have become well known names, administrators like Frank McInerney and Dean Bischoff; coaches like Bob Pickett and Russ Kidd; and players like Mike McEvilly and Cliff Pedrow.

On the other hand, there are lots and lots of athletes out there who never get any publicity, they don't stand a chance to become Budweiser Athlete of the Week. Yet these sports figures have earned a special spot in campus sports lore.

It does not matter if you are a first semester freshman or a scared stiff second semester senior, we have all seen these people. They are the campus sports personalities we all know and love. Well, maybe we don't love them, but we know them anyway:

THE BIKER: This campus has bike riders of all shapes and sizes and persuasion, from that craggy old journalism professor with his ancient English 3-speed, all the way up to that maniac who broke the sound barrier a couple of weeks ago on Route 116.

My favorite campus biker, however, is that reckless speedster who cruises along the major arteries about warp 8, scaring the daylights out of just about everyone. Like the WWII flying ace, this guy puts little stickers on his bike frame to keep track of how many pedestrians he has knocked into next week.

THE FRISBEE FANATIC: You must have seen these guys at some point in your UMass career, either by the campus pond, in front of Hasbrouck or in the Southwest horseshoe, always showing off their stuff, thinking they are God's gift to Amherst.

If took me 15 years just to learn how to catch and throw one of those fool things, now I learn that that's not enough. Now, you have to catch the thing behind your back, spin it on your finger for twenty minutes, pass it between your legs nine times, and throw it like a discus. Those guys make me sick.

THE PIN BALL FREAK: A day at UMass would not be complete without a casual stroll through the Campus Center pinball area to watch the diehards. It's fun to watch these guys swear like Marines, jump up and down in frustration, slam their fists down in agony and spend every quarter they have, all in pursuit of that elusive free game.

You can spot the real afficionado right off. This guy can tilt his favorite machine at 300 yards. He schedules classes around peak PB hours and probably has his name etched in immortality on the top of Jocker Poker—"Hector Barsouloukas—9,000,010 points, 11/13/58."

THE ALL-WEATHER JOGGER: Everyone and his Aunt Florence is out there jogging these days. However, most of these people are mere fair-weather runners, who only take part when it's sunny, temps in the low 80's with little humidity.

The runner I really love is the guy who is out there in the nasty stuff, the kind of weather they test car batteries in. Our man is out there puffing along with 19 pairs of sweatpants, seven shirts, Mickey Mouse gloves, his Patriots hat with the pom pom, frost on his mustache, the whole deal. He's the kind of guy who makes you feel inadequate when you're inside watching soap operas.

THE PYRAMID JOCKS: You can behold these historic athletes almost every day, down by the Southwest pyramids. Usually they're playing football in April and baseball in November, and they are always playing frisbee.

It isn't enough that the poor students have to come out of that DC trying to hold down California Quiche or Turkey Divan or God forbid, Broccoli and Cauliflower casserole, now they have to dodge softballs, lacrosse balls, tennis balls, golf balls, bowling balls, you name it, they have to dodge t.

This Panasonic stereo has one component your component system doesn't have.

A handle.

AM/FM STEREO CASSETTE RECORDER

The best stereo sound used to come only from components. Until Panasonic put a handle on it. Now great sound carries everywhere with the Panasonic RX-5500 AM/FM stereo cassette recorder, a super portable that packs the features found in many component systems.

Like linear-scale tuning that helps you pinpoint FM stations even on a crowded dial. For even more accuracy, there's a 14-stage LED tuning meter with separate right and left level channel indicators.

The 5500 also has component-like sophistication in the cassette section. Starting with the Dolby* Noise Reduction system. To a three-position tape selector that lets you handle the three most popular types of tape (CrO_2, FeCr and normal). There are two built-in, sensitive condenser microphones for great live recordings. And with mike-mixing you can record along with your radio favorites. While the digital tape counter, Cue and Review and locking pause control add up to effortless recording and playback.

The 5500's speakers are just as remarkable, with two powerful 6½" woofers and two 1¼" tweeters. And with separate controls for treble and bass, you can tailor the sound to your taste. There's even a variable sound monitor that lets you adjust the volume of the speakers without affecting your headphones. Or vice versa.

And all of this incredibly sophisticated sound travels just about anywhere because it operates on batteries (not included) and on any of the 4 international voltages. Even from your car with an optional adapter (RP-952).

The RX-5500. It's part of the line of Panasonic "Stereos with a Handle." Pick one up.

Long Journey to Purdue

Regarding Purdue University's recent complaint that their free Journey concert never materialized (September Ampersand), Jim Hernandez of Journey's management company, Nightmare Productions, said they are working with Jeff Chamberlain on the Purdue University Student Concert Committee attempting to schedule the concert during Journey's 1980 tour — which starts next June. "We're actively pursuing this, stardom has not taken its toll, we intend to fulfill our obligation, and we salute Purdue for winning the contest," Hernandez said. He also noted that Nightmare had received a considerable quantity of mail from disgruntled Purdue students. Hang in there; by June, 1980, 2½ years will have passed since the contest.

In the October "In Both Ears" Martin writes about recording records. How about a story on the newest idea, using a computer numbering system to "label" each note then reproduce it later on the record? Second, page 23, that ad on birth control. How about a story on how and what does and does not work? That ad is dangerous in it's "simplified" view of the subject.

I have recently moved, and to my chagrin, have found that I've thrown out my favorite issue of Ampersand. Rather than have fits, I have determined to remain calm and ask if you sell back copies of your magazine. I haven't the vaguest idea how much this will cost.

We do indeed sell back issues (except we're out of Volume I, No. 1). Just send $1.00 for each issue, including mailing; be sure to specify which issues you want — if you can't remember the number, tell us who's on the cover.

On page 27 of Ampersand (Sept. '79) you incorrectly referred to Herman Brood as a German, and to Nina Hagen as a Dutch punk star. The reverse happens to be the case; rectification would be appreciated.

PETER LEVENBACH

Your ill-considered comments on the movie Cruising (Vol. III, No. 1) suggest that protests against it violate the First Amendment. Come now. Of all the pious, art-for-art's sake defenses I have read of this particular piece of exploitation, yours is the most ludicrous. The First Amendment protects citizens from the government, not Hollywood from the citizens, gay or otherwise.

If Friedkin had decided to re-make Birth of a Nation on 125th Street, blacks would have been outraged. Any distinction you perceive between that and filming a movie that will lead to gays being beaten (at the least) in the streets of Greenwich Village must spring from your own lack of concern for the lives of gays.

Every version of the script discussed thus far makes it clear that the movie's core will be violent attacks on gays. Every responsible gay group in New York (including the National Gay Task Force) fears that such a movie will only serve to increase the already alarming assaults on gays. Yet you would have the gay community sit quietly by while Pacino and company use the streets of gay neighborhoods to put gay lives in jeopardy.

F. C. RIECH, JR.
LAW STUDENTS FOR HUMAN RIGHTS
UNIVERSITY OF TEXAS LAW SCHOOL
AUSTIN, TX

I wonder if you will print this rebuttal to your editorial condemning the gay community's outrage against William Friedkin's filming of Cruising.

Do you lend support to the making and showing of a film that depicts the destruction of human beings as self-inflicted and deserved, as Cruising does? As writer-activist Doug Ireland has stated, "Cruising is a snuff film." Your free speech argument does not stand up any more than did claims that Nazis had a constitutional guarantee to march through Skokie calling for the gassing of Jews. Cruising is an incitement to murder and beat gays — as was Anita Bryant's hate campaign, which resulted in a nation-wide wave of brutal attacks on gay men. Finally, you cannot rationalize by quoting the producers of the film about the nature of their product; I have read the script printed in a major gay magazine, which is absolute evidence that Cruising is a vomit-bag glorification of killings of gays.

Cruising has no right to be supported by public protection — the New York City police, who have severely beaten protesting gays — nor does it have a right to exist and be shown publicly. An outraged gay community will see to it that this threat to our lives will never be shown.

In gay pride,

STEVE KELLER

The editor replies: "I do not lend (or withhold) my support to any film until I have seen the film; I don't condemn any book until I have read it, I damn no music until I have heard it. That may sound pious to you; I think it's practical and just. The Bill of Rights guarantees certain freedoms to all of us, not just to those we like and approve. The Nazis had a right to march in Skokie, William Friedkin has a right to make Cruising. Films cannot be judged by published scripts because words on paper are not the same as images on a screen. The film may be better, worse or simply different; we won't know until we see it."

HEAR IT LIKE THE PROS, AT AN UNHEARD-OF PRICE. JBL'S NEW RADIANCE SERIES.

JBL. By far the leader with the pros.

You'll find JBLs in America's top recording studios.

Now you can find them in a new price range for your home. The Radiance Series loudspeakers are the first JBLs at popular prices, starting at $139.95 suggested retail.

These new JBLs are designed to reproduce music with accuracy. They have clean highs and tight bass. Radiance speakers require an amplifier with only 10 watts per channel — highly efficient when compared to other speakers in their class. And yet they can handle large power — from 80 watts per channel to 200 watts per channel.

Radiance loudspeakers come in three models: a two-way system, a three-way system with a 10" woofer, and a three-way system with a large 12" woofer. With their front grilles on, their appearance is classic, traditional, fitting any room decor. With their grilles off, they have a striking, space-age look.

The Radiance Series was designed by the same engineers who designed JBL's more expensive systems and professional equipment.

They're evaluated with the same computer facilities and test equipment used in the development of the more costly JBL speakers.

And they're subjected to the same rigorous demands of JBL's listening panel, the committee that must give the final auditory "o.k." to any JBL.

The results are unheard-of in this price range.

Hear them now. JBL's new Radiance Series.

& OUT THE OTHER

Rape by Instrumentality

Preliminary hearings were recently held in the case of composer/producer/musician Jack Nitzsche, who was charged with rape by instrumentality, burglary, assault with intent to commit murder, assault with a deadly weapon and false imprisonment, all stemming from his alleged June 29 visit to actress Carrie Snodgress, who says she and her son zeke, 7 (by Neil Young), were asleep when Nitzsche arrived at 2 a.m., brandishing a handgun. Guest Paul Williams (the director, not the song writer) fled into the night while Nitzsche reportedly pistol-whipped Snodgress, threatened her son, and then committed rape with the barrel of his revolver. Snodgress suffered a fractured cheekbone, bruises and abrasins, and had an 18-stitches cut on her thumb. This case will be one of the first to apply a new California statute which outlaws rape by instrumentality — using an object other than sexual organs. (The new rape law is sometimes called the Born Innocent law; a 9-year-old San Francisco girl was raped with a beer bottle by four kids who were inspired by a similar assault in that TV movie). Nitzsche, 42, pleaded not guilty to all counts. Nitzsche worked with Neil Young and Crazy Horse during the six years that Snodgress lived with Young; Nitzsche did the music for One Flew Over the Cuckoo's Nest and Performance. Earlier in his career, Nitzsche worked as an arranger for Phil Spector, had a 1963 hit single, "The Lonely Surfer," and appeared as pianist and arranger on a few Rolling Stones album. Snodgress, 33, was nominated for anOscar for her performance in Diary of a Mad Housewife, and recently appeared in The Fury.

Whatever Happened to ...

Paul Simon who hasn't released an album since Still Crazy After All These Years in 1975, is now at work on his first movie (still untitled). He wrote it and he stars in it, playing a contemporary musician "in conflict with changing times"; other cast members are Blair Brown as his wife and Dan Stern (who played Cyril in Breaking Away). There will be concert footage of various big-name acts of the Sixties — such as Peter, Paul & Mary, the Byrds, Sly Stone — but none of these has actually been signed (yes, there will be new Simon tunes, at last, and a soundtrack album). Director is Robert M. Young, who did Rich Kids, and filming started a few weeks ago in ... Cleveland. Cleveland! Short people got no reason.

No Knack for Humor

Every Saturday in Hollywood there is a post-midnight musical memorabilia swap meet in the parking lot across from Capitol Records' Vine Street headquarters. Until recently, San Francisco artist Hugh Brown had the hottest items on the lot — an array of "Knuke the Knack" shirts, bumper stickers and buttons ridiculing the well-hyped Capitol "new wave" group. One hilarious night, leader Doug Fieger and other Knack members grinningly purchased armloads of Brown's satiric goodies, but the joke was referred to the Knack's legal eagles soon after "Honk if You've Slept with Sharona" bumper stickers became Brown's top seller. Under a salvo of charges — "trademark infringement, copyright infringement, unfair competition, defamation and invasion of privacy" — Brown has knuckled under. Thus Saturday night collectors are deprived forever of what was to be Brown's next comment on the Knack phenomenon — little voodoo dolls of everyone in the group, pins included.

Energy Drain

Estimated receipts from the MUSE (Musicians United for Safe Energy) concert, held September 19-23 at Madison Square Garden, have dropped from $750,000 to "less than half a million," according to concert spokesman David Fenton. Spearheaded by John Hall, former leader of Orleans and now a solo artist, the MUSE shows were brightened by a hot Bruce Springsteen performance, along with appearances by James Taylor, Carly Simon, the Doobie Brothers, Ry Cooder, Chaka Khan, Tom Petty, Bonnie Raitt, Paul Simon, Peter Tosh and others. What went wrong is that the concert went so right: overtime fees to the huge Garden staff were necessary because the shows cooked on till 1:30 some nights. However, notes Fenton, a film of the event and a soundtrack album may boost the take back up. Elektra-Asylum, which has the record rights, has not yet set a release date. An outdoor rally near the World Trade Center, held on the last day of the concert series, drew approximately 200,000 anti-nuke demonstrators.

But what about the lonely pro-nuke demonstrators? A pair of them was recently sighted at Los Angeles International Airport, separately, of course. One, a young woman reminiscent of Gilda Radner's Lisa Loopner character, wore a sign that read "More People Have Died in Ted Kennedy's Car Than in Nuclear Accidents." A few days later her place had been taken by a blond and pudgy young man whose slogan was "Nuclear Plants Are Built Better Than Jane Fonda."

Ins & Outs

Black Sabbath has cancelled its fall tour; in fact, the group has cancelled half its members, with guitarist Tony Iommi and drummer Bill Ward remaining. Vocalist Ozzy Osbourne has been replaced by Ronnie James Dio (formerly with Rainbow), and bassist Geezer Butler was replaced by Craig Gruber. Iommi reportedly wants to make more polished noise, like Queen or Foreigner, while Osbourne — in Los Angeles auditioning musicians recently — claims he'll carry on with the pulverizing riffs and a new band. Sabbath hopes to re-schedule for mid February.

Big Deals

Alan Alda and Jane Fonda (build or no build) are both much richer these days; Alda signed a deal with Universal that gives him total artistic control of any film he wants to make, providing he stays under a $7 million budget. His first project, The Four Seasons (which he wrote), traces the friendships of three couples in a one year period. Only Woody Allen has such a good deal, at UA. Fonda, meanwhile, gets $2 million from Columbia, her biggest salary yet, for Her Brother's Keeper, about a woman prison guard.

The Illustrated George Carlin is the comedian's first starring/producing film venture, for which Carlin sent out this call for supporting players: "male, varied age, 300-400 lbs, femme, varied age, 300-400 lbs; males (2) and femme, varied age, midgets."

Ken Russell, the British director who gave us Lisztomania, The Devils, Valentino and others, will next make The Monster of Loch Ness, no less, in which said monster emerges as a mutant victim of radiation fallout — just like all those ants, blobs, and Things of the Fifties. More bad news: screenwriter is John Byrum, who wrote the wretched Mahogany.

John Contardo, after nine years as Sha Na Na's ballad specialist, has scored a solo album deal. Plans call for a touch of disco, a heavy serving of romantic balladry and absolutely no "oldies but goodies," of which the handsome Contardo seems to have become pretty sick. But he won't hang up the gold lamé pantsuit just yet. "Sha," as he calls the durable act, still makes tidy sums from its tours and television show.

Lucrative Kiss-Off

As her marriage to Kiss' cuddly Peter Criss veered toward the rocks, Lydia Criss did as so many of today's smart women do: she hired attorney Marvin Mitchelson, mouthpiece of choice in several recent celebrity alimony and living-together-no-longer settlements, Michelle Triola Marvin's and Britt Ekland's among them. How did the former Mrs. Criss make out? "All I can say," gloated Mitchelson, "is that she's glad to be a millionaire."

can you be bribed?

You get $35.21 in bribes when you try 10 DAK ML90 high energy cassettes risk free for only $2.19 each. Your bribe is bigger than your purchase!

FREE CATALOGUE "HOW TO RECORD" BOOKLET

Hats off to Maxell. Their UDXL cassette established a new standard of sound quality for all cassettes.

The new DAK ML90 starts another new technology. A technology of protection from Hi frequency loss and of extreme reliability.

Later we are going to offer you valuable bribes, just for testing these cassettes. risk free; so read on!

YOUR TIME IS PRECIOUS

Imagine yourself just finishing recording the second side of a 90 minute cassette and horrors, the cassette jams. Tape is wound around the capstan, your recorder may be damaged and you've just wasted 90 minutes of your time and perhaps lost a great recording off FM.

Enter DAK. We manufacture over one million units of cassette tape each month in our factory. Many of our tapes are used for high speed duplication where they are recorded at speeds up to 8 times normal. This is the ultimate stress for cassettes and causes more failures than any other use.

When we first started, 12 years ago, DAK's cassettes failed, just like many others. So we installed over $20,000 worth of high speed duplication equipment at our factory and set out to design the perfect cassette.

MOLYSULFIDE

Failure after failure. For six years we substituted, remade, tested and retested until we positively linked the major cause of cassette failure to the slip sheets, or liners in the cassette. Evidently, 3M and TDK were hot on our heels, because they have now also come out with new liners.

We developed polyester slip sheets with raised spring loaded ridges to guide each layer of tape as it winds. We coat the liners with a unique formulation of graphite and a new chemical, molysulfide.

Molysulfide reduces friction several times better than graphite and allows the tape to move more freely within the cassette. The molysulfide is tougher and makes the liner much more resistant to wear.

Hi frequency protection! Tape is basically plastic, and as it moves within the cassette internal friction causes the build up of static electricity, much as rubbing a balloon against your hair, or scuffing your shoes on a carpet in dry weather.

Static electricity within the cassette was drastically reduced by the low friction of the molysulfide and easily bled off, so that its tendency to erase very high frequencies was drastically reduced. A very important consideration for often played tapes.

MAXELL IS BETTER

Yes, honestly, if you own a $1000 cassette deck like a Nakamici, the frequency responses of Maxell UDXL or TDK SA are superior to DAK and you just might be able to hear the difference.

DAK ML has a frequency response that is flat from 40cps to 14,500 ±3db. Virtually all cassette recorders priced under $600 are flat ±3db from 40cps to about 12,000cps, so we have over 2000cps to spare, and you'll probably never notice the difference.

No apology. We feel that we have equaled or exceeded the mechanical reliability of virtually all cassettes and offer one of the best frequency responses in the industry. Maxell UDXL is truly the Rolls Royce of the industry, and DAK is comparable to the 100% US made Cadillac or Corvette!

Price DAK manufactures the tape we sell. You avoid paying the wholesaler and retailer profits. While Maxell UDXL 90s may sell for $3.50 to $4.50 each at retail, DAK ML90s sell factory direct to you for only $2.19 each complete with deluxe boxes and index insert cards.

YOU WIN

You are paying less for the 10, 90 minute cassettes than you would pay for the comparable bribes we are offering if you went to a Radio Shack store.

CHECK THE VALUE OF THE DAK BRIBES AT RADIO SHACK

The next time your batteries are dead in a calculator, radio, flashlight or battery operated recorder, you'll be glad you have this versatile battery eliminator AC adaptor.

You'll save lots of money on batteries because now you can plug in, instead of using up expensive batteries. 4 voltages: 3, 4.5, 6 and 9 volts plus 4 plugs to fit virtually anything battery powered. Radio Shack sells a similar 4 voltage adaptor for $9.95.

Think of it, 10 of the most commonly used six foot hook up cords with RCA plugs at each end. You can connect friends recorders, extra tuners, or virtually any stereo equipment. You'll certainly appreciate these cords in the years to come. Radio Shack sells their six foot cords for $1.89 each.

You need clean tape heads to make good recordings. The easiest way to clean your heads is with DAK's 12 oz. deluxe spray head cleaner, complete with handy snorkel tube. Radio Shack doesn't sell a single large 12 oz. can, but 12 oz. from them costs $6.36.

The comparable Radio Shack prices are not list prices, but the actual prices you would pay at a store when this ad was written.

WE WIN TOO

Customers like you are very valuable in the form of future business. We anticipate receiving over 6000 orders and 4500 repeat customers from this advertisement to add to our list of over 57,000 "actives." We are betting you will buy our cassettes again, and we are putting our money where our mouth is!

TRY DAK ML90 FREE

We want you to try these high energy cassettes on your own recorder without obligation for 30 days. If you aren't 100% satisfied for any reason, simply return the tapes and bribes to DAK for a full refund.

To order your 10 DAK ML90 minute high energy cassettes and receive your $35.21 bribe with your credit card, simply call toll free 800, 423-2636. (in Calif. call 213-984-1559) or send your check for $21.90 plus $3 for postage and handling for each group of 10 cassettes and bribes to DAK. (Calif. residents add 6% sales tax).

DAK unconditionally guarantees all DAK cassettes for one year against any defects in material or workmanship.

Why not order an extra group of 10 DAK ML90 cassettes for yourself or a friend? We will add one free ML90 cassette to each additional 10 you buy and of course you get all 3 bribes with each group of 10 tapes.

WHICH HIGH BIAS TAPE WINS WITH MAHLER'S FOURTH SYMPHONY?

Original manuscript sketch for the first movement of Gustav Mahler's Fourth Symphony. Courtesy of The Newberry Library, Chicago.

Choose eight measures of Mahler's Fourth that are really rich in the high frequencies. The type of passage that high bias tapes are designed for.

Record it on your favorite high bias cassette, using the Chrome/CrO_2 setting. Then again on MEMOREX HIGH BIAS.

Now play back the tapes.

We're convinced you'll have a new favorite.

MEMOREX HIGH BIAS is made with an exclusive ferrite crystal oxide formulation. No high bias tape delivers greater high frequency fidelity with less noise, plus truer response across the entire frequency range.

In short, you can't find a high bias cassette that gives you truer reproduction.

On Screen

NOSFERATU, starring Klaus Kinski, Isabelle Adjani, Bruno Ganz; written and directed by Werner Herzog.

Laughter that director Werner Herzog never wanted gurgled from segments of the Nosferatu audience the night I saw the film. To some, Klaus Kinski's tormented, spindle-fingered, alabaster-domed Count Dracula was sillier camp than old Bela Lugosi, not to be given the respect drawn by sophisticated, brilliantined Frank Langella in the recent, poorly-directed remake of Dracula.

But Herzog, besides making a film full of visual glory — steeped in somber, grainy browns, blacks and creams — has done something unique and worthwhile with the frequently-revived tale of Transylvania's star attraction. Nosferatu, like Herzog's not-to-be-missed Aguirre, the Wrath of God, provokes meditation as much as horror. No great amount of time is given over to lurking, to the springing of inevitable blood ambushes; more is given to action-linked characterizations, detailing how love, anguish, sexuality, horror, compulsion and death work on and within the human heart. The laughter of people with fast-food brains aside, this is a profound film. Herzog aims to get soul-deep, and there's precision to his plans; hardly a motion or an expression or a landscape is recorded that doesn't resonate with the atmosphere and intention of the movie.

Isabelle Adjani, so beautiful she seems not of Earth, is the central character as Lucy Harker. Women exist in most vampire tales to be seduced, but though Adjani does trigger Dracula's bizarre longing and willfulness, she also fully understands his menace, before anyone else, and by herself destroys the seemingly omnipotent monster. Incredible visions anchor the movie in memory — townspeople carrying processions of fresh, unpainted coffins in lines that look from overhead like outsized tapeworms passing through the city's broad streets; mummified human remains (filmed in Guanajuato, Mexico) that appear still desirous of life; slow shots of single bats, swimming through air like sharks through salt water. Laughter is certainly a great commodity, but those who take Nosferatu straight will see an eloquent, soulful masterwork.

Byron Laursen

QUADROPHENIA, starring Phil Daniels & Leslie Ash; written by Dave Humphries, Martin Stellman & Franc Roddam; directed by Roddam.

The story goes that just before the late Keith Moon sold his California home to Alice Cooper, he first drove his Rolls Royce into the swimming pool. From smashing guitars on stage to smashing conventions within their own industry, the Who have always emphasized basic emotions. Even after a decade of successes they're still the tough kids on the block called rock & roll. Quadrophenia, based on the Who's two-album set of the same name, is rock's own version of West Side Story, but instead of Sharks vs. Jets, it's mods vs. rockers; instead of New York, London. But Quadrophenia is a tougher film than its Fifties counterpart. It concentrates a great deal on frustration, the aggression it causes and the effects: drugs and a certain everyone-for-himself attitude.

The film focuses on Jimmy Cooper (played convincingly by Phil Daniels), a messenger boy by day and a mod by night. He hangs out with his gang of pill-popping, lower-class teenagers and makes war on rockers. The latter are leather-jacketed James Dean types who prefer the music of Gene Vincent and the Ronettes to the harder stuff the mods favor — the Who, for example.

Stephanie (Leslie Ash) is the girl Jimmy wants. But this isn't West Side Story and Stephanie is no Maria. She dumps Jimmy after securing his emotional loss of innocence and launching his heart-rending search for identity. The final affecting scenes, with virtually no dialogue, tell of Jimmy's break from the mod gang and the discovery of his individuality. A line spoken earlier reverberates as he overlooks the spectacular white cliffs of England, "I don't want to be the same as everybody!"

Quadrophenia is a difficult film to relate strongly to. The mods vs. rockers schism never infiltrated America. Rock & roll was rooted in the English lower classes, whereas America accepted it into its middle class. While the film's full two hours are masterfully plotted and photographed, the viewer is left with little at the end beyond a meager understanding of aggression and the pleasure of hearing the Who on the soundtrack. Quadrophenia needed to present a four-dimensional character, as the album did, and not just the raw, tough side.

Sal Manna

A MAN, A WOMAN AND A BANK, starring Donald Sutherland, Brooke Adams and Paul Mazursky; written by Raynold Gideon, Bruce Evans and Stuart Margolin; directed by Noel Black.

There are films that are like onions... and, there are films that are like tennis balls. The onions may not look that great on the surface, but they have layers and depths which become apparent on closer inspection. The tennis balls are pretty bouncy at first glance, but a good hard look reveals them to be hopelessly empty. A Man, a Woman and a Bank is a tennis ball, no doubt about it.

At first flush, the film is seemingly entertaining. It reunites the team of Donald Sutherland and Brooke Adams from Invasion of the Body Snatchers and adds the wild card of Paul Mazursky, a brilliant director (An Unmarried Woman) and former actor of general renown. The underlying precept of the film — that machines can be used to undermine other machines and thereby rob burglarproof banks — is solid, and the pacing of A Man, a Woman and a Bank is so swift that it isn't until the film is over, and you're searching for your car, that you realize you've been tossed a marshmallow. The old wool has been pulled over your eyes. You've been dealt a funny deck. You've been had.

What's missing here is: 1) Tension — we're never really made to wonder whether Sutherland and Mazursky will pull off their robbery. We always assume they will. They're too nice to go to jail; 2) Empathy — Mazursky and Sutherland aren't really schleppy enough to feel sorry for, and aren't slick enough to act as behavioral models. They just kind of are, stranded somewhere between cartoon characters and non-entities; 3) The Big Device — Sutherland and Mazursky find the plans to the computer system by just walking into the construction site. At night, they just walk in to check it out. When they're robbing the bank, Sutherland just walks past a guard with 250 pounds of money on his back. And he's almost caught when a policeman stops him for having a defective stop light.

A Man, a Woman and a Bank, in the end, is so contrived that even its contrivances aren't interesting. If you're going to tell me lies, at least tell me lies I might want to believe.

Merrill Shindler

Kinski as the Vampyre.

STARTING OVER, with Burt Reynolds, Jill Clayburgh and Candice Bergen; written by James L. Brooks; directed by Alan J. Pakula

Well, well, well, another mid-life crisis movie. This time Bergen throws away hubby Reynolds (if anyone can imagine throwing Reynolds away...) in order to "find herself" in her new songwriting career. Reynolds returns to Boston to build a new life for himself. We should be grateful this wasn't titled An Unmarried Man.

Jill Clayburgh is excellent as a wary schoolteacher who wants nothing to do with a separated man (she changes her mind, no surprise). Reynolds is Reynolds; he's not a wooden Indian any more, but he still reacts to every situation with a cute, incredulous stare, as if he's amazed to be part of such silliness. Bergen is the revelation: she plays a woman so self-absorbed she doesn't realize she's a buffoon — at least when she's singing, and sing Bergen does, loudly, with panache, and a terrible voice. When she maneuvers Reynolds into a motel room reunion, her first move is not to douse the lights and hit the sack; no, she turns on her handy cassette machine and sings to him, to his extreme discomfort. Bergen never flinches, she gives her all, and her all is definitely enough. After many years of being primarily decorative, Bergen seems to have finally decided to act. Our gain.

But in spite of all these terrific stars and a few very funny scenes, Starting Over never really gets started. It's slick, predictable, it exploits the same old familiar situations (we know it's hard to launch a new life after a divorce; we've heard this before), and if it weren't for the high-priced talent smiling away on screen, this would be just another TV movie (not surprising, considering writer/producer James L. Brooks once wrote and produced The Mary Tyler Moore Show). Even the music sounds like TV; would someone please break Marvin Hamlisch's piano... preferably over his head?

AND JUSTICE FOR ALL, with Al Pacino and Jack Warden; written by Valerie Curtin and Barry Levinson; directed by Norman Jewison.

Those who hate lawyers, think the legal system is a crock and admire everything Al Pacino does will probably enjoy And Justice for All, but those of us who think movies ought to do more than just pander to our most juvenile anti-establishment impulses will be left with a very sour aftertaste.

Not that And Justice for All doesn't have its moments, especially in the beginning. For a while, it's so funny and perceptive about the labyrinth known as the American legal system, it's like watching the ultimate movie for the Seventies. Then, just as we're certain the film is on solid ground, it becomes nothing more than an ego-stroking star-trip for both Pacino and director Jewison.

The movie ultimately becomes so calculated it's a cheat. By the end, when every character we care about is destroyed, and everyone save Pacino has been exposed as an immoral opportunist, we're too exhausted to care. What no one making this movie seemed to realize is that farce must be believable if it's to work. Black comedy depends on keeping enough reality so that the insanity of the world makes absurd sense. M.A.S.H. (the movie) and Hospital did that for medicine; Network did that for the media; And Justice for All does not do that for the legal profession.

Jacoba Atlas

PROMISES IN THE DARK, starring Marsha Mason, Michael Brandon, Susan Clark, Ned Beatty and Kathleen Beller; written by Loring Mandel; directed by Jerome Hellman.

This is a straightforward film about a 17-year-old girl (Beller) who dies of cancer, and how her illness affects the lives of her parents (Clark and Beatty), friends and doctor (Mason). It's an earnest effort to de-glamorize death, which in movies and television programs traditionally takes place with perfect makeup, teary eyes and trembling chin.

The subplot of Mason's affair with radiologist Brandon never quite jells; it seems to exist only to show how Beller's courage has inspired Mason to live a fuller, more compassionate life (their affair proceeds like all movie affairs — cutely. There's no such thing as an uncute cinematic courtship anymore). Better to spend the time showing us the daily strain of living with a terminal cancer patient, so that we'd better understand the rather odd behavior of the parents. I've been assured that's exactly the way people act in such situations, but the film should have made that clearer to those of us fortunate enough not to have lived through similar tragedies.

The most affecting parts of the film are those moments when Beller spends time with her boyfriend and girlfriends; they are all high-spirited, intelligent, likeable kids, except that she's dying and they aren't. The unmentioned contrast is more poignant than all the hand-wringing.

AUTHOR HARRY CREWS

Swampy Lust, Blood & Guts

BY GLENN ABEL & JOHNNY MCLEAN

The black twirlies still haunt Harry Crews. He fights them daily, pounding away at his 1920's manual typewriter, occasionally throwing the machine across the room in fits of creative rage, but the twirlies persist. They come at night after the writer has laid himself to rest; they come before his lectures at the University of Florida; they follow in his travels, often driving him into libraries in distant cities — just to reaffirm his identity by looking up his name in card catalogs.

Crews, like many authors, feels an acute dread of creative impotence. "I live with the constant fear of waking up one morning and not being able to write," said the forty-three-year-old creator of ten books and countless major magazine articles. "It is always with me — the fear, the sinking black twirlies."

Like the hero of Kris Kristofferson's song "The Pilgrim," Crews is a walking contradiction: he's a hard-drinking man whom violence stalks like a cat after fresh meat; at the same time, he is an erudite professor of English. Crews is a cock fighting aficionado with the sensitivity of a poet. He's a southern cracker, raised in the abject poverty of rural Georgia, who has perused every major literary work in the language. His writing has garnered dozens of awards, but he is proudest of the South African government ban on his novel The Gospel Singer.

Crews, as the song goes, is partly truth and partly fiction. One week he may be addressing groups of up to 500 students at Florida's flagship university in Gainesville; the next week he may fade into the Alaskan back country or into the secret society of the Klu Klux Klan on assignment for magazines such as Playboy and Esquire.

Despite Crews' rising literary star, his unconventional lifestyle has earned him more than a few detractors in the academic community at UF. Nonetheless, students pack his lectures and there is always a lengthy waiting list for class registration. "I don't understand why a man like Crews is allowed to teach at any top college," said one of his peers at UF. "Professors are supposed to set an example for students — not self-destruct in front of them."

JOHN KIELY

"Crews may occasionally come to class behind a few drinks," countered one of his past students, "but Crews drunk is better than ninety-nine percent of the other professors in this university. He cares about his students: he gives them their money's worth in class, and he treats them like human beings. Besides, he's the best writer in Florida."

Crews needs the academic life. The university gives him a touchstone to return to — a place to finetune his craft. His life on the edge provides raw material for stories — the basis for his insights into the human condition.

"Being vulnerable," as Crews calls it, has caused him to be cut, broken and boiled alive. As a child, Crews stumbled into a cast-iron wash pot filled with water hot enough to scald the hide off a hog. "I broke my neck when I was seventeen," Crews said, leaning his 215-pound bulk over a vat of greens and pork neck in his suburban Gainesville home's kitchen. A golden earring hung from his left lobe. "I had my ribs broken on both sides, my sternum broken, both legs broken and both feet broken." His knees have been crippled from childhood ailments, motorcycle accidents and a recent beating. At a south Florida dog fight Crews found himself on the business end of a straight razor; he now sports a new set of short purple scars. Bouts with alcoholism have also taken their toll on Crews. "I am one of the all-time, sloppy, disgusting drunks," he admits, "the kind mothers can point out to their children as an example of the final evil of alcohol."

But trauma is the stuff Crews' art is made of. In A Childhood: the biography of a place, which Time dubbed the best nonfiction book of 1978, Crews tells of growing up poor in Bacon County, Georgia, a place with "so little margin for error, for bad luck, that when something went wrong, it almost always brought something else down with it." The book begins ten years before Crews' birth, with his father catching gonorrhea from a Seminole girl while working in the Everglades. It ends with Crews standing in a tobacco field, back from three years in the Marines, knowing he would never leave his people completely, but realizing he had put a distance between himself and Bacon County that he would never again be able to cross.

"A Childhood was by far the most difficult book I've ever written," said Crews, who has produced eight novels and two nonfiction books. "It was difficult for many reasons — as a writer you have to get some distance on a subject to be able to do anything with it. Otherwise you just warp it, distort it, whatever. Secondly, the people I wrote about are still alive. Or their children are still alive. And I have better things to do with my time than to make people feel bad about themselves.

"The book is obviously a search for my father, whom I never knew, who died when I was twenty-one months old. There is nothing unusual in that, it doesn't make me unique, except that in my case it influenced everything."

A Childhood, like most of Crews' works, is a series of stories carefully woven around a central narrative line. The stories are told in an authentic southern voice with a compassionate yet never condescending tone. Crews evokes sympathy and understanding for his characters through incisive use of dialogue, and a painstaking attention to detail and mood.

> "The night was dark as only the swamp can be dark and they could not see each other there in the bunkhouse. The rhythmic stroke of the dredge's engine came counterpoint to my daddy's shaky voice as he told Cecil what was wrong.
> "When Cecil finally did speak, he said: 'I hope it was good, boy. I sho do'...
> "He had not wanted her, but they had been in the swamp for three years...So since he could not have what he wanted, he tried to want what he could have, but it had been miserable, all of it because of the way she sounded and the way she smelled and the mosquitoes clotted about their faces thick as a veil and the heavy black flies crawled over their legs. "'It weren't that good,' daddy said."
> —A Childhood

Crews is a storyteller in the oral tradition of the deep South. His talent grew from hours of sitting on a floor with a sugar-tit in his mouth, listening to talk at quilting parties, from listening to men converse as they dipped their feet into the washtub around the fire at night.

"I started out to be and only want to be a storyteller," Crews said. He spooned a small amount of liquid off the greens and pork concoction and tasted it with satisfaction.Outside, Crews' teenage son and a friend romped through the woods surrounding the house. Crews' wife, Sally, a thin, energetic woman whom he's married three times, watched from the porch. "If you're a storyteller in the traditional sense," he continued, "then your strong suit has got to be the narrative line. It's called, after all, the narrative art. That's not much to want to be I reckon, but that's all I want to be. I want to tell stories. Stories which hopefully inform the human situation. After all, the keepers of the legends and myths in primitive societies were always the shaman, the priest, the throwers of the chicken bones, the lookers of the goat entrails...And I think that's what telling stories is all about.

"When I started out, I thought it was enough to learn to write well, which God knows is hard enough. But unfortunately that's not enough. Ultimately you have to have something to say. And that includes everybody," Crews said. He pressed his head back and expanded his neck. His hair rimmed his head like a shaggy halo and his earring glinted in the late afternoon light filtering in through the kitchen window. "I don't know what my associates at the university think of my work: they see me being sent to Alaska to do a story and I write about a whore having her ass tattoed while blowing cocaine up her nose. What the hell is that?"

Crews' unorthodox style of journalism has made him one of the most sought after, highly-paid free lancers in the business. Blood and Grits, his most recent book, is comprised of non-fiction works which first appeared in Esquire and Playboy. Before you have settled into the book — the ice in your drink has not yet melted — Crews' has told tales of a fellow named "Dog" plighting his troth with a 300-pound Frosty-Creme waitress and of an elephant being hanged to death for stomping a little girl. The collection has been generally well received, but one reviewer, Christopher Lahmann-Haupt of the New York Times, raised Crews' hackles.

"He said he didn't believe an elephant was hanged from a winch in Erwin, Tennessee," Crews growled. "All he had to do was pick up the phone and call Erwin and see if there was one hanged there. Hell, there was a period of time during the Thirties in which there was this genocide of elephants throughout the South.

"You can never trust a man who has three initials in front of his name or a hyphenated last name. And the next time I see Christopher Lahmann-Haupt, I'm gonna take the hyphen right out of his name."

Ernest Hemingway once said no one has the right to dig up an author's journalistic work — writing done against deadlines, writing done out of necessity — and compare it to work he has written to write the best he can. Crews feels no such qualms.

"The technique and craft of fiction is there in all of my non-fiction. Dialogue is there, character is there, place is there, transitions are there. There are all kinds of transitions: spiritual transitions, emotional transitions — it's all there. But, as Robert Frost said, 'It's bad when it gets too bookish.' You can't allow yourself to get isolated and cut off from the street."

While Crews often justifies — or at least explains — acts of violence in his writing, he is not a particularly violent man. His athlete's body has sagged with age and abuse, and when he is drawn into brawls he rarely hits more than the ground. He sees his fascination wtih blood sports — cock and dog fighting — as a natural, ingrained result of his southern rural upbringing. "I've always been addicted to blood sports of all kinds," Crews, also a falconing enthusiast, wrote of the illegal games. "And I make no apology for it. Where I come from, we don't confuse animals with people. We don't sleep with poodles or whisper baby talk to horses."

He was in south Florida recently working on a pit bull fighting story for Esquire: "I wasn't bullying up to anybody, I was just trying to see the end of the fight. I thought this one dog was going to quit because the other dog had been at his throat twenty minutes. But the dog got to his feet and shook the other dog out and kicked his tail. I wanted to see the end, so I asked this fellow to move. I was so excited, I didn't notice how really big he was. Jack, when he hit me I went down like a sack of flour. Things happen, you know. You're subject to get hurt at a dog fight.

"I get into things sometimes, you can't deny that. The world is a very, very dangerous thing for anything mortal. But what the hell are you going to do because it's dangerous? Go hide in a closet?"

Of all the dangerous situations Crews has put himself in while working on a major magazine piece, his latest assignment may be the most hazardous to date. He's just finished an installment of Playgirl's "His Turn" column, which features a different male contributor each month. Crews' opening line should have feminists nationwide calling for his head: "I'm sick and tired of women being in my face and on my case."

"I mean, I don't even know what to call them anymore," Crews explained, tugging on his earring. "'Lady' will do in some parts of the country, 'woman' will do in others. But the word that stands up best is 'person,' which is the most faceless, bloodless, anonymous word — one of the worst in the language."

Will Crews make the ultimate commitment to his art? Will he pose in the nude?

"No," he said with a wide grin. "But hell, if they had asked a few years ago, I would have gladly shucked down." &

TILT STANDS

ADJUSTABLE SPEAKER STANDS

Speaker UPPERS solid walnut stained hardwood TILT speaker stands elevate your speaker systems 7" off of the floor and TILT them back for maximum high end dispersion.

Our TILT stands work with any speakers up to 19" wide and 150 lbs. in weight — they're completely adjustable — and need no assembly; they're ready to use. The combination of the subtle 9° display angle and the 7" elevation from floor level combine to significantly increase high frequency dispersion characteristics and improve base response. The result is a much cleaner, open, natural sound — from the same speakers you have now — with a very small relative investment!

Is Bette Midler a Changed Woman? Yes... and No

BY MICHELE KORT

When Bette Midler came on stage for the "Night for Gay Rights" benefit at the Hollywood Bowl two years ago, she had to face a restless, angry crowd. Richard Pryor's earlier routine — which ended with a request to "Kiss my rich black ass" — had touched off raw nerves among the predominately gay male audience.

"Well," vamped Midler when her turn came, "you can kiss my rich white ass."

Since she burst on the mass public consciousness in the early 1970s, Midler has had the knack for making fun of pretension — her own and others — in shows that are part humor, part nostalgia (for the Twenties through the Sixties), part show-business parody, and part straightforward pop/rock. She has a good time with the whole idea of roles, Ellen Willis observed in a 1973 review, by sharing with audiences "what it meant to be a performer, what it meant to be a fan, why all of us were a little of both."

Midler recalled that evening at the Bowl when we met recently in her rented house high about Beverly Hills: "What a nightmare! I had no idea what was going on." I reminded her that she had spent much of her set wiping blood off her knees, and she revealed that it wasn't an infrequent occurrence at the time.

"I used to drink a lot when I worked," she said. "There was one tour I did that I was drunk the whole tour. I used to do 20-foot knee slides with no knee pads. After two weeks of this I woke up with knees that were so swollen I had to be taken to the hospital and wear ice packs. Yet I still kept doing those knee slides."

She also threw up before shows and cried a lot. "I was terrible," she said. "I would get so fuzzy-headed I couldn't remember my lines. Once I did a show that was four hours long because I was so drunk I couldn't get off the stage.

"Finally last year I had enough," she said. "I didn't want to do it that way any more."

Midler's made other big changes in her professional life in the past year, like firing her longtime manager, Aaron Russo. Managing herself, she recorded and released an album, Thighs and Whispers, which she calls the best she's made in a "long long long time," she finished a week of sold-out shows at L.A.'s Greek Theatre, and she's about to tour Europe. On the personal side, she's maintained a 3-year steady relationship with actor Peter Riegert. And she's about to become a movie star.

The film is The Rose, which was "loosely inspired" by the lives of Janis Joplin and those male performers now in rock and roll heaven who "were on sort of a cutaway railroad car, just living too fast," as Midler described them. The Rose premieres in early November, but more on that later.

The ambitious starring role as "the Rose" is a far cry from Midler's first film work as an extra in Hawaii, which was shot in the state of the same name, where Midler grew up. The money she earned from Hawaii paid her way to New York, where she climbed from department store clerk to chorus girl in Fiddler on the Roof, to a principal role in Fiddler, to Village clubs, to the gay male Continental Baths, to Johnny Carson, and to stardom as "The Divine Miss M." Around the time of her triumphant three-week engagement at New York's Palace Theater in the fall of 1973 she was called "the latest show business phenomenon" and was nearly everybody's cover girl. Newsweek, in its cover story, was moved to remark, "It's safe to say that even Garland's legendary appearances in the great old house never aroused so much anticipation as Bette Midler's Palace debut."

It's also safe to say that Bette Midler has never reached quite so high a plane since. She's hardly been inactive or unsuccessful, recording six albums, taping two TV specials, and putting together a grandiose Broadway show, "Clams on the Half Shell." On the other hand, after her second album her record sales were only modest, and she tended at times to sort of disappear from public view. "I didn't do that much," she admitted, "I did 'Clams,' I did little interviews, but I really wasn't doing anything. I was sort of in a period of transition. Growing up, I guess."

Perhaps the tremendous media hype of 1973 had been hard on her. "Not really," she replied. "I wasn't paying much attention. I was pretty much living my life the way I'd always lived it. I was just trying to make the music work and the stage shows interesting, and as they get bigger they get harder."

What was especially hard, it seems, was the failure to find a formula for hit records after the popularity of her first two albums. One easily remembers early Midler songs like "Do You Wanna Dance" or "Friends" or "Boogie Woogie Bugle Boy of Company B". But what can we hum from her other albums? "I liked my third record very much," said Midler, "but it was not a big seller and it disappointed me. My record career has been kind of checkered. I didn't have a lot of communication with the label, didn't know them very well even though I've been with them a good long number of years now."

She also lost the services of Barry Manilow after her second album as he caught a quick flight to superstardom, and that left her without a musical director. "I didn't have anybody just to call up in the middle of the night and sing songs with. I like to work with bands, good musicians."

Midler's current upswing has a lot to do with how she's remedied her nagging musical direction and recording problems. Of Thighs and Whispers she said, "It has an energy to it which my last couple of records haven't had. There's a lot of stuff on it that's very personal, accessible, and it's played real well and sung real well too, which is nice for a change."

Midler attributes the lack of energy to frustration in the studio and a fearful need to please critics, fans, and managers. But, "I no longer have that fear," she said. "I don't have anyone to please but myself. I'm more willing to take chances."

Thighs and Whispers is slickly produced and arranged by Arif Mardin and features Midler's typical mixture of upbeat songs and ballads, R&B and big band, parody and poignancy. The biggest change is the disco flavor to many of the songs. I like the album but feel that her voice is rather buried, a problem with most slick pop record productions these days. She completely disagreed. "Maybe it's your pressing," she suggested. "You should turn the treble up on your machine. On my machine my voice is really loud."

Our talk turned to the band that's now backing her, which includes talented 20-year-old keyboard player, Randy Kerber, who co-wrote with Midler the song "Hurricane" on the new album. "I like this band very much," she said. "I was always more of an entertainer type than a person who had a band. The girl performers like the Chers and the Ann-Margrets, they don't have bands. They have someone who looks after them and that fellow puts the band together. But I don't want to do it that way and more. I've gotten to the point where there's a certain kind of commerical and financial commitment you have to make if you're going to be a musician. You have to get that group of people around you who can express your ideas. It's taken me a long time to get to that point."

If Midler expresses a real "take charge" attitude toward her career now, it gibes with the fact that she is in charge. She's been managing herself for about seven months since she fired Russo, a man who was sometimes portrayed by the media as Midler's Svengali figure.

"I was his Svengali, give me a break," she said with an edge of disdain. "I introduced him to the world, poor thing. Oh, I shouldn't be rude. He was a fairly manipulative-type guy. There were certain kinds of withholding approbation-type games that went on between us that were not really healthy. When I finally came around to realizing I didn't want to play the games any more I knew it was time to go, and so I went."

Midler has an assistant, a lawyer, and business people to help her manage herself, but she's about ready to hire another full-charge manager. "Managing yourself," she found out, "means you lose your sense of humor."

"I didn't realize," she said ruefully, "that once I was named as the one who had the overview, then the voices would be raised in the great hue and cry against me and my taste. In other words, anyone with any kind of a bitch would come to me. I would be so busy worrying about what side of the stage people were going to enter from and whether they were going to get per diem or not and who was going to buy road cases that I didn't remember my own name, literally. That was what it was like in the first couple of weeks. Then I said, 'Oh hell with this, you go do this' and I turned it over to the people who really should have done it in the first place."

Bette Midler, manager, is a role she's ready to relinquish. Bette Midler, movie star, is a role she may soon have to embrace. She seemed a little embarrassed at the possibility, but obviously it's crossed her mind.

"I've been sort of trying not to think about it. And the day keeps getting closer and closer and it's building up a bit. It's exciting just because everyone else is excited."

Midler dreamed of being an actress when she was growing up, but she saw herself as the dowager type — Dame Mae Whitty, Edna Mae Oliver, amd most especially Ethel Barrymore. Those great ladies are a far cry from Janis Joplin, but Midler was quick to quash the Joplin comparison.

"I'm always surprised when people say, 'She's portraying Janis Joplin.' I'm so staggered that anyone would think I would do a thing like that... I had seen Janis a few times when she was working, and I did love her. But when I took that role I made a conscious decision to cut off whatever there was in me that loved Janis, because I didn't want to bring that to the picture. I thought it would be unfair to her memory."

Interestingly enough, throughout her career Midler has been compared or connected in some way with Joplin, especially in the energy and intensity of their stage performances. Mopsy Kennedy in Ms. (August 1973) wrote, "She [Midler] fills the gap left in our hearts by the death of Janis Joplin. She fills the need for a combination of the cynical and the sentimental..."

"That sounds right," said Midler. "Absolutely. The brave face to the world. Courage in the face of inevitable doom. And also a raspberry in the face of inevitable doom."

Was it well-placed raspberries that have kept Bette Midler from getting caught on that cutaway railroad car that doomed so many other star performers? We talked at length about the reasons that performers self-destruct — an insatiable need for audience love, a romance with booze and drugs, a lack of the kind of discipline Midler learned from the theatre. "Everyone wants to be Elvis Presley," she said, "but no one wants to die like that. Everyone wants to be Elvis when he was young, but no one realizes that if you're going to be Elvis when you're young then you're going to be Elvis when you're old too." It seems to be Midler's professionalism — and separation of her private self from her stage persona — that have protected her from burning out. Janis Joplin was not all that different on and off stage, but Bette Midler, who dresses outrageously and appears big and bawdy onstage, is at home a petite, pretty woman in her 30s who usually wears jeans, a simple blouse, and glasses. She's humorous, but not "on," earthy and friendly but with an edge of reserve. The great disparity in appearance and manner from stage to home made me wonder if the "Divine Miss M" was a fantasy creation.

"No," said Midler. "I'm like that. It depends on what I do with my hair." Midler explained that she really enjoys the sexy, tacky, "tart" image she portrays in performance and on the cover of her new album (where she pushes forward her famous assets rather provocatively). "I like being overly sexy. I like taking sex and slapping it in the face a couple of times. I don't really in my personal life pay that much attention to it. I think of it like food..."

Two nights later Midler gave her last performance at the Greek, and her voice often sounded like it was coming out of speakers with bad wiring (she had already been quite hoarse during our interview, no doubt affected by L.A.'s worse smog siege in 24 years). But that wasn't why I was disappointed. I was unmoved by her familiar shtick — the sex and booze and dope jokes, the overlong parody of a bad night club entertainer, the comedy monologue that would have been better sprinkled throughout the show, and the attempt at "serious" musical drama in a mime-song segment where Midler played an old woman on a park bench. I wanted to be Bill Murray on Saturday Night Live and tell her "Come off it, Bette, drop all the fancy stuff and be you. Now get outta here, I love ya."

The best part of the show at the Greek was a medley of songs from The Rose — a lovely ballad ("The Rose"), a straight-ahead rocker ("Midnight in Memphis") and a rather histrionic cover of Lorraine Ellison's classic "Stay with Me." Midler was magic on these numbers, so it's exciting to hear that she might put together a strictly rock and roll show. "I'd like the chance just to sing that kind of music straight through and not break it up with any other kind of music... see how much there is to say in the framework of that."

I asked her if she thought she'd ever be able to capture her terrific stage energy on vinyl. "I think I got closer to it on Thighs and Whispers than I ever have," she said. "I know you don't think so. But on my machine it sounds action-packed. You must be playing it on a Victrola, for Christ's sake. Turn up the treble!"

HILTON RUIZ
Excition (SteepleChase)

Ruiz is a vibrant young pianist first exposed through his work with Charles Mingus. His second album for the SteepleChase label of Denmark shows a broad musical scope and a knack for choosing empathetic cohorts. Reedman Frank Foster, trumpeter Richard Williams, bassist Buster Williams and drummer Roy Brooks, A-1 New York pros all, dig into this program of traditional jazz works with elan and sensitivity.

Ruiz' "Dedication to the Cooker" is reasonably straightforward until the bridge, where he starts tossing 3/4 and 4/4 time back and forth, a rhythmic diversion that keeps everyone on his toes. The title track opens with all voices playing free, an exhilarating yet slightly chaotic sound. Foster tickles the heights with his wispy soprano while Ruiz blocks out idea-forming chords. Bassist Williams uses small figures and long runs, mumbling low and whistling high. Ruiz' solo begins clear and cool, but soon he's a mad bull on the loose roaring wildly over the keyboard. A ruminative duet with bass and drums ends this fervent piece.

Side two has a rich, poignant ballad played by Foster on tenor sax, and a rockhouse blues.

FLEETWOOD MAC
Tusk (Warner Brothers)

The label of Fleetwood Mac's long-awaited Tusk says it straight: "Special thanks from the band to Lindsey Buckingham." Most of the interesting material, spread thin in an otherwise typical Mac offering, is Buckingham's. His "Tusk," the most ambitious song on the album, benefits from Mick Fleetwood's propulsive beat and hauntingly claustrophobic production. "Not That Funny" is as close to hard rock & roll as Mac will ever get. "The Ledge" is a surprisingly raw stab at rockabilly.

Besides his usual steady-as-a-rock drumming, Fleetwood's aggressive double-timing in "What Makes You Think You're the One," literally carries the tune. Christine McVie's long suit is the lilting love ballad, represented here by "Over and Over," which echoes her work in Future Games. But her "Honey Hi" and "Brown Eyes" are built on a single melody line without so much as a chorus change. Luxurious production gives an illusion of freshness, but there's nothing unique in the songs. "Think About Me" is a successful rocker, something Tusk could use more of. Given her vocal and artistic limitations, it's no wonder Stevie Nicks' contributions are the most predictable. "Sisters of the Moon" is her token gypsy claptrap, arranged like "Stairway to Heaven." "Beautiful Child" is awash with the naive lyricism that makes Nicks' writing so tiresome: "I'm not a child anymore/I'm tall enough to reach for the stars/I'm old enough to love from afar/. . . I will do as I'm told." Tusk's superb production may placate old fans—there's still a huge audience for smooth-as-milk music. But without Buckingham's creative boost this album, which cost $1 million to make, would be the costliest puff pastry in history.

TOM VERLAINE
Tom Verlaine (Elektra)

Those familiar with Tom Verlaine's earlier work with the now-dissolved Television won't be too surprised: his inventive, spare guitar lines, the surrealist rural dreamscapes of his lyrics and his reedy voice dominate this solo effort, as they did Adventure and the daring Marquee Moon.

Jay Daugherty, Patti Smith's capable if obvious drummer, maintains the beat reliably, providing a steady ground for Verlaine's explorations. Second guitarists Mark Abel and Ricky Wilson build a Television-like rhythmic complexity on "Last Night" and "Breakin' in My Heart," the only songs on which Verlaine takes extended solos. Verlaine's playing, unadorned and willfully unvirtuosic by most standards, eschews the clichéd histrionics of most rock and roll guitarists. His solo structures, curiously static, abjure obvious hooks and climaxes for a more compelling form based on irresolution and extension.

Vocally, Verlaine is much looser here than on previous outings. Along with Patti Smith, he helped pioneer an edgy, modernist singing style which has since broadened and become capable of carrying more moods.

On Adventure Verlaine sang that he "loved disaster and loved what came after." What has come after is an elegant and precise set of music.

JOHN PRINE
Pink Cadillac (Asylum)

John Prine's seventh album was recorded in Memphis, at Sam (Sun Records) Phillips' studio, the place where Elvis Presley, Jerry Lee Lewis and Roy Orbison cut their early records. Pink Cadillac, while not as lyric-centered as the discs that contained "Sam Stone," "Paradise" and "Hello in There," is arguably the gravelly-voiced Chicagoan's best album to date. Backed by a foursome of players raised on rockabilly and Bo Diddley (bassist Tom Piekarski, keyboard/sax man Howard Levy, guitarist John Burns and drummer Angie Varias), and produced by Sam Phillips' sons Knox and Jerry, Pink Cadillac is a raw, bare-to-the-bones excursion into Prine's variably funny, tragic, prejudiced, hard-edged world.

Prine kicks off with "Chinatown," a rowdy, downright rude blues stroll through the sidestreets of ethnic bigotry, where "The moon is yellow and the people are too/They roll their eggs on a bar-b-cue," where the singer, "Feelin' kinda tacky with a headful of saki," gets a "sidways hickey from a slant-eyed chickey." Vulgar, alcohol-laced humor makes Prine sound less desperate than usual. Still, there's Roly Salley's achingly unhappy "Killin' the Blues," the Viet Nam vet of Saigon who exclaims, "The static in my attic's gettin' ready to blow," and the moody, unreal "Down by the Side of the Road," about the mysterious shooting of the singer's girlfriend.

Offsetting these weird, affecting mumblings are a series of amicably humorous tunes—"Cold War," a drunken Texas waltz, the raucous "Ubangi Stomp" and Elvis Presley's lusty old "Baby Let's Play House."

Pink Cadillac is about as uncommercial and basic as a record can get these days. Yet repeated playings won't wear down its appeal. The playing is pliant, but not dragfootedly sloppy. Prine, hobnobbing with the mid-Fifties ghosts of Memphis, Tennessee, has backed off a step from his sullen singer/songwriter stance to make an album that sounds just as great as it reads.

THE LAST
LA Explosion (Bomp)
THE MOTELS
The Motels (Capitol)
THE POP Go! (Arista
20/20
20/20 (Epic)

Los Angeles hasn't offered much in recent years to the growth of rock and roll, but perhaps this lull will be reversed by the flurry of new wave-inspired activity, the results of which are now appearing on vinyl. Among the earliest and most impressive releases are those from 20/20, the Pop, the Motels and the Last.

20/20 is a band in the true collaborative sense. Songwriting, lead vocals and guitar leads are shared by guitarist Steve Allen, bassist Ron Flynt and Chris Silagyi, who adds third-part harmonies as well as guitar and simple synthesizer lines. Mike Gallo's drumming propels their tunes into great dance music.

The Pop helped initiate the LA music surge, but, since signing to Arista a year ago, they've been absent from the scene. Go! seems detached, concealing the wonderful street band instincts of the Pop's first album, independently released on Automatic. Only "She Really Means That Much to Me" and "Shakeaway" reflect the earlier reverence for infectious melodies.

Martha Davis, lyricist and singer for the Motels, makes each number an intimate experience, her expressive voice tuning songs of lonely frustration—like "Total Control" and "Counting"—into emotional pleas. She likes to twist words; in "Dressing Up," the lyrics "outfitted to fit in" reduce the rules of high fashion to a childish game. The album's guitar interplay is also exceptional, as is Martin Jourard's stirring sax work.

The Last take an aggressive stance on LA Explosion, touching at times on social themes. The album's generous cuts vary from folk rock, surf music and acid punk to the Mersey beat sound, but occasional lyric bluttings like "Love is a gobbler, love is a turkey," obscure the Last's intensity and potent use of dynamics. Quality is recovered with the fierce yet humourous slagging of "A Fool Like You," the well-constructed "Looking at You" and others.

CHUCK BERRY
Rockit (Atco)

From angry Anglo punksters like the Clash to blues-rock revivalists like George Thorogood, way on back to the Beatles and the Stones, almost everyone has copped licks and entire songs from the indefatigable Chuck Berry. Without him, rock & roll probably wouldn't exist. The sly, spry creator of "Johnny B. Goode" remains smitten with the spirit of rock, as Rockit, his umpteenth release, testifies. All ten songs are originals, except a reggae-fied reworking of his languid "Havana Moon." Berry's lyrics, notably on "It Wuden't Me," are wry, raunchy and angularly ungrammatical: poetry rife with playful verbosity. Though a mite slower in his fifth decade, Chuck Berry's still got it.

Steven X. Rea

DAVID JOHANSEN
In Style (Blue Sky)

David Johansen's first solo album, David Johansen, successfully combined the devil-may-care raunch of his old band, the New York Dolls, and mainstream hard rock. In Style is smoother and more tuneful, but misses the mark. Johansen, who evokes Mick Jagger while trying to sound like the Four Tops' Levi Stubbs, fails to capture the dirty-streets romanticism he aims for. Worse, Johansen has gone in for cultural plundering. "She Knew She Was Falling in Love" cops reggae licks and stock Jamaican catchphrases to minimal effect. "Swaheto Woman," a hapless meeting of Giorgio Moroder and the E Street Band, giddily advises the women of Soweto, the dreadful Johannesburg ghetto, to hold their heads up high, stand up for their rights, and they will be free. Bwana Dave doesn't say what to do should they get caught on the white side of town without passbooks.

Elsewhere, "She" and "Wreckless Crazy" are typically frenzied Johansen rockers and "Melody" a straight cop from the Four Tops songbook. A wonderfully impudent sense of style, apparent on these last numbers, has always made Johansen's music enjoyable. It's ironic he should name an LP In Style just when that sense was least secure.

Don Snowden

LED ZEPPELIN
In Through the Out Door (Swan Song)

Though Led Zep never actually called it quits, after three years away from the studio, this is effectively their comeback album, with varied styles and influences represented. Jimmy Page bares some firmly planted country roots on "Hot Dog," as disposable (here synonymous with commercial) a piece as "D'Yer Mak'er." "Carouselambra" is a modernization of Physical Graffiti's majestic "Kashmir," with contrasting movements built on keyboards and synthesizers, sometimes as overlapping patterns—including one with (could this be?) a disco riff. "All of My Love," another highlight, is a supreme love song in Zep's grandiose, primeval tradition. Unfortunately, it segues into "I'm Gonna Crawl," with a sappy orchestrated intro and a passel of Robert Plant's trite utterances.

After three years, releasing a new Led Zeppelin LP is like tossing Alpo to a pack of starving dogs. Weak spots aside, it's a satisfying continuation of the Zep bombast. In the wake of In Through's immediate coursing to Number One, seven of the band's previous eight albums have returned to the charts. With fans like that, Led Zeppelin can come in through any door it damn well pleases.

J.D. SOUTHER
You're Only Lonely (Columbia)

One of the finest singer-songwriters ever to emerge from the smogpots of Southern California, J.D. Souther has written brilliantly twisted songs like "New Kid in Town" for the Eagles and "White Rhythm and Blues" and "Faithless Love" for Linda Ronstadt. But his own career has never really jelled, perhaps due to Souther's reputation for being a rock & roll asshole. In this age of Pink Lady and Bee Gees, the fans want love, not malice. Which is too bad, because there's more to Souther's occasional fits of pique than all the falsetto jive talkin' in the world. Like Souther sings it, "The sun is sinkin' and people start thinkin' at twilight." It's at twilight that the music of J.D. Souther cuts deepest.

JULES AND THE POLAR BEARS
Phonetics (Columbia)

Jules and the Polar Bears, owners of the best band name in years, are a critics' fave, which means that all the soft-between-the-ears ersatz intellectuals who write about rock put on their headphones, listen to their records about 97 times at high volume and emerge to discourse at length. Actually, Phonetics is an interesting album, as was last year's praised-to-the-skies Got No Breeding. But it slides from memory like water off a duck's back. That's usually the problem with critics' bands.

GARLAND JEFFREYS
American Boy & Girl (A&M)

In this concept album about urban runaways and hostile street life, Jeffreys has returned to the expert blendings of rock, reggae and Hispanic flavorings with heartfelt social observation that made 1977's Ghostwriter great. Several of the new songs are based on the experiences of kids from a 24-hour crisis center in Times Square. Jeffreys includes several straightforward romantic songs, his warm, rich singing studded with subtle inflections. But American Boy & Girl principally expresses the urban hustle for survival, the desperate maintenance of life's spark. Ghostwriter, something of a masterwork, was more immediate, but American Boy & Girl is an illuminating return to form.

The Cars, Paramount Theatre, Portland, Oregon

Elliot Easton, lead guitarist for the Cars and an expert at looking like Mick Jagger's photograph on the cover of Black and Blue, appeared briefly perplexed. The problem: the Cars were midway through the first set of a sold-out Portland show, and their sound system was obliterating one of their songs.

Small wonder. When you've got two banks of speakers, each the size and shape of the Hollywood Squares Tic-Tac-Toe set on either flank and you crank two or three zillion watts of energy through both simultaneously, you're bound to invite audio overkill.

Enough decibels were being pumped out of those monsters, in fact, to create an actual wind. This didn't seem to bother their wall-to-wall stable of fans, however. The Cars comprise one fat swell of the New, Newer, Newest Wave and, considering the health of that movement in Portland, it would have been no surprise to have found the place full up with all those young people in black and white who spend scads of time reading Rimbaud and trying to figure out what sex they want to be.

But no. The audience was a middle-class crew. Demure. Adidas-ed young ladies. Guys coiffed with $20 Son-of-Farrah shags and wearing football jerseys that said things like HAWAII 78 on the back. Pretty split level.

And nobody seemed to mind that, early on, the cacophony and distortion was such that the band came across like the world's loudest underwater all-electric ensemble.

Still, the sound was unfortunate because the Car's lead singer Ric Ocasek is a genius, and his long suit is constructing music that is not only extremely powerful, but tricky and precise. They were playing at the Paramount, a beautiful art-deco Disneyland-style ex-movie theatre, a medium-sized hall that should have been acoustically perfect. Big enough to handle the Cars' orchestral energy and small enough not to force them to go batshit powerwise to make their point.

The droll and tidy Cars are aggressive, sophisticated studio musicians; their two albums have established them as the subtle, snazzy archivists of Seventies popular music. Carefully re-inventing lots of the best hooks recorded over the last decade or so, the Cars on record are at the creative service of the ghosts of those as diverse as T. Rex, Bryan Ferry, Lou Reed, Spirit, Led Zeppelin, Country Joe and His Ancient Fish, Abbey Road-period Beatles, the Seeds, and even the Association. (If you don't believe me on that last one, just listen to the background vocals on "My Best Friend's Girl.") Polished, creative, yet classic. Think of these guys as the expensive Swedish furniture of rock. In Portland, however, it's possible they were slumming it a bit. One of the best things about the Cars is their packaging — the gorgeous Vargas rendering on the cover of Candy-O, the super-slick production work, the artfully cool and obscure lyrics, and, hey, no doubt about it, the Cars are all great dressers. Probably everyone should dress just like they do on the jacket of that second album.

Here, though, they were a little loose. Co-lead singer Benjamin Orr was the belle of the ball, vamping around the stage like the true tart we all know him to be, duded out in high-heeled cowboy booties, black tights and a red sleeveless leopard-skin pullover — the kind of threads J. C. Penney's might sell to an AC/DC refugee from the Marvel Comics Outer Space Super Hero series. To his theatrical credit, however, Mr. Orr is able to convey that special little secret something that lets us know: look, I'm not a raving fruitcake. Heavens no!

Four or five numbers into the evening, the Cars' sound began to cohere. And by mid-show, when they launched into the icy, wild and thumping "Living in Stereo," things started to get pretty entertaining. Greg Hawkes co-wrote this stunner with Ocasek. Hawkes, dressed in white shirt and tie, looks like he might just be old enough to join the army, but he knows exactly what he's doing behind his keyboards. He may be one of the few people on earth who can overdub fake strings intelligently live. After "Stereo," the music just got better and better. What saved them, if nothing else, is that — despite the fact that they play all original material — the Cars have scarcely a melody to their name that couldn't cut it as a successful single. They may be asleep during sound-check, but their material is uniformly excellent. They closed the show with two encores and, in total, a good time was had by all.

Mark Christensen

The Kinks, Johnny Cougar McDonough Gym, Georgetown University Washington, D.C.

Propelled across the stage and back again and again, showing off an hilarious fluency in body language, Ray Davies made everyone forget a miserably rainy night outside. Renowned veteran frontman of the Kinks, the red hot Davies was in absolute command of the crowd from first note to last.

Material for the show was drawn from the two most rocking periods of the Kinks' twenty-five-plus album career, their earliest stuff and their latest. They've put away most of their mid-period reclusive ballads and reclusive silliness onstage in favor of a tight and glorious statement, a little renaissance in hard rock. A key factor in the transformation is the redevelopment by Ray's brother Dave of the buzzsaw guitar technique that made "You Really Got Me" such a grabber in 1964 and so often imitated in the years since.

Sleepwalker, Misfits and Low Budget, their last three albums, combined with vigorous touring, have won the Kinks one of rock's broadest audiences. Many in attendance were local hiskoolers too young to pronounce "radio" when the Kinks first hit big. And at least one University of Virginia professor braved the elements to catch the show.

Singer Johnny Cougar and his band began the show almost two hours late. They claimed power problems, an ironic excuse for D.C., and went on to deliver an uninspiring set of hard rock punctured, to poor effect, by Cougar's commentary. "I Need a Lover Who Won't Drive Me Crazy" has been picking up airplay, so the band wisely stretched out the song's well-modulated, catchy guitar duet intro in concert. Wisely, because Cougar is between poor and fair as a lyricist/singer and worse than that as an emcee; his unnecessary speeches interrupted many songs in mid-measure. Cougar needs more duestime in front of a friendly hometown audience instead of angry, rainsoaked Washingtonians.

The Wild Tchoupitoulas, New Orleans' singingest Indians

Mardi Gras Mambo, Roxy, Los Angeles

At heart, this was the Meters' Mambo. A secure grasp of essential New Orleans R&B made that group, which once opened a Rolling Stones tour and appeared on dozens of other people's hit records, a deeply influential unit.

Art and Cyril Neville, formerly the Meters' keyboard and percussion nucleus, again established the musical backbone for a night of variously-styled New Orleans performers. Though the stinging guitar and polyrhythmic drumming of ex-Meters Leo Noncentelli (now with Robert Palmer) and Joe "Zigaboo" Modeliste (recently with Ron Wood's New Barbarians) were missed, the Mardi Gras Mambo was the best display of R&B music to hit Los Angeles since the last visit of Clifton Chenier and his Louisiana Hot Band.

Working from an old-style R&B Revue format, the show opened with the New Orleans All-Stars, a melding of the Neville Brothers Band and some of Fats Domino's current sidemen. "Caravan," their first song, interwove tenor sax and trumpet lines into a voodoo rhumba. Art Neville's swampy, behind-the-beat organ chords led tempo shifts all the way into light swing. Next, an upbeat blues vamp served to showcase the reedmen.

Earl King held court for the second segment, suffering from a slight case of laryngitis. Yet his guitar playing — with honking, pushed-up block chords — combined lead and rhythm into a single, arresting style. "Trick Bag," his trademark song, was a crowd pleaser despite the gruffled vocal delivery.

Up next was Aaron Neville, so smooth-voiced he made Marvin Gaye seem like a hoarse shouter by comparison, yet so slick he almost came off like a lounge-singing weasel. Neville over-used his supply of velvety vocal quivers, but still triggered a collective swoon when the audience recognized his early Sixties signature hit, "Tell It Like It Is." Singalongs greeted each chorus.

After the third distracting stage change, the Neville Brothers Band took over and the show reached boiling point. Opening with "Fire on the Bayou," the chunky title track from one of the Meters' Warner Bros. albums, the band served such a persuasive gumbo that dancing lines popped up between tables. Leading their set through a red-hot version of Little Willie John's "Fever" and a downright insane take on "Honeydipper," the Neville Brothers Band briefly made the night as festive and hypnotic as any Crescent City Music enthusiast could have wished.

Framed with extravagant plumage and sequined breast-plates, looking like a humanized blend of flamingo, ostrich, jukebox and '58 Buick, the Wild Tchopitoulas next demonstrated Mardi Gras costumery at its most flamboyant extreme. Their performance was more show than go, although Big Chief Jolly and his tribesmen chanted with spirit, particularly on "Meet the Boys on the Battlefront."

Though not necessarily a show for the current pop music audience, the Mardi Gras Mambo's peak moments captivated a clubful of black and white listeners more pleased to revel in classic R&B than pursue the Nex. Big Thing. New Orleans music, a bottom-heavy blend of all that's danceable from several musical and racial traditions, proved again that in the long run casting a spell is more effective than sinking a hook.

MICHAEL JACKSON
Off the Wall (Epic)

Like most great popular singers, Michael Jackson has an immediately recognizable voice. That unique instrument has never been so well used as on Off the Wall, Jackson's first solo album since leaving Motown four years ago. Along with the credit due Jackson, high praise is also due producer Quincy Jones, who found for Jackson a perfect balance of gritty funk and slick R&B.

Dance numbers dominate Side One, leading with the smash "Don't Stop Till You Get Enough." Jackson wrote or co-wrote three of the side's four songs, each of them striking an adventuresome yet contemporary sound. "Rock with You," written by Rod Temperton of Heatwave, is a perfect commercial groove, already being played as the album's second hit. Side Two, with uneven material, is less compelling. Still, it's a joy to hear Jackson come into his own, outside the famous family grouping. This is also a giant step for Quincy Jones, for most of all this is an album of mood, where the colorings and shadings of the production set Jackson's bouyant voice off with subtlety and brilliance.

VAN MORRISON
Into the Music (Warner Bros.)

Give an open ear to Astral Weeks, St. Dominic's Preview, Tupelo Honey or most any of Van Morrison's albums and it becomes clear: the Belfast bluesman has been living on the edge, beyond the fringe and into the ether longer than any of us has even known that stuff was out there. Which maybe is why it's so hard to understand what he's doing. Since splitting from Marin County's mellower-than-thou lifestyle and re-absorbing spiritual hits from his Irish homeland, Van Morrison has released three eclectic albums — Period of Transition, Wavelength and now Into the Music. Where early Van Morrison was brilliance crystallized and middle Van Morrison was murky but soulful, the current stuff sort of isn't. If these albums do share a direction, it's toward rebirth, celebration and religion. "Moving from the dark end of the street to the bright side of the road," as Into the Music's first lyrics put it. Maybe they encompass our entire belief system, who knows? I think this is a great album, and knowing has nothing to do with that realization.

BLUE STEEL
No More Lonely Nights (Infinity)

Blue Steel play a good ol' bar room variety of rock & roll, booze and boogie music with its feet planted firmly in the middle of a road that stretches back to the Fifties and beyond. These boys have worked the roadbed thoroughly, having individually toured and recorded with Rondstadt, the Eagles and Jackson Browne to name a few, and it shows up to their advantage on this debut album on Infinity, California rock and Southern Boogie are the two dominant forces here. The tunes usually end up with some heads down, no-nonsense jamming that indicates the live roots of this band. The songs — about rock & roll, girls, playing guitar, girls who won't, life on the road, dope and girls who would like to — are unlikely to expand the consciousness of the listener. But that is of lesser importance to the goodtime nature of the music, which is well played with a genuine spontaneity about it.

WOODY SHAW
Woody III (Columbia)

Of all the current artists signed to Columbia Records, cornetist-Flugelhornist Woody Shaw is foremost in preserving the jazz tradition that was inspired by the life and music of John Coltrane. Shaw's records are fiery and provocative, yet pleasing to the ear.

Side one is a three-part suite, Woody I, II, and III, all utilizing a large ensemble for compositional diversity and broadness of sound. Woody I varies between a tension-building vamp and straight swing, with Shaw, pianist Onaje Allen Gumbs and saxophonist Carter Jefferson playing with passion. II is more uptempo and highlights the remarkable trombonist Steve Turre, whose fat, trembling sound and rocket-like technique are only sidelights to an unshakable rhythmic sense that makes this artist the next major voice on his instrument. Curtis Fuller, an elder statesman from the generation before Turre's, has warm trombone phrases on Woody III, a lovely and quiet piece that also has energetic Flugelhorn from the leader.

Side two comes out of the hole like a 5-second dragster with "To Kill a Brick," a hell-bent blues that has good solos from Shaw, Gumbs, bassist Buster Williams, and alto saxophonists Rene McLean and James Spaulding, all interspersed between readings of the melody. Then the horns trade four-bar phrases so that the contrasting approaches of these artists can be further revealed. Drummer Victor Lewis, here as elsewhere, sparks the take with a vivid, prancing cymbal. A beautiful segue is "Organ Grinder," a shimmering quartet vehicle for Shaw's sassy, bright Flugelhorn and guest pianist George Cables's spread-out voicings and nimble-fingered lines. You can play this one over and over, it just keeps right on singing. The closer is a 'live' take from New York's Village Vanguard, with the leader, reedman Jefferson and Gumbs simply tearing up "Escape Velocity," the 32-bar modal tune based on Miles Davis's "So What." It's some heady stuff.

Do Unto Others

In the lengthy prologue to his new novel, Jailbird (Delacorte Press/Seymour Lawrence, $9.95), Kurt Vonnegut quotes a letter from an Indiana high school student who claims to have discovered the idea that lies at the core of all his work to date: "Love may fail, but courtesy will prevail." Vonnegut goes on to say that if he'd known that before, it would have saved him the trouble of writing several books. Fortunately, he didn't find out before he finished this nifty little fable, his best novel since Slaughterhouse-Five.

The narrator, one Walter F. Starbuck, is a pathetic little creature, a weak-willed Washington bureaucrat, the sorriest casualty of both the McCarthy era and Watergate. In typical Vonnegut fashion, the narrative skips back and forth in time, relating Walter's childhood as the son of domestics for a stammering scion of a robber-baron industrial magnate, his brief career as a campus Communist in the Thirties, his rise and fall in Washington, and his imprisonment after getting enmeshed in the Watergate business. At last, he is out of prison, an old man bereft of money, friends and prospects, when a sudden twist of fate makes him an executive in a superconglomerate bent on buying up the whole country.

But Vonnegut isn't out to give us a tragicomic history of modern America; what he's really after is the American Free Enterprise System, with its attendant emphasis on the sacredness of private property, forces which, he seems to contend, lie behind all of our recent history. Through the narrative and its seemingly irrelevant asides to things like American labor history and science fiction stories (another typical Vonnegut technique), we see how the American mania for money and property results in vast scrap-heaps of unnecessary human refuse and demeans the haves as well as the have-nots.

I know, I know, this sounds like basic Marxism. But Vonnegut says that isn't the answer, either, because something always manages to go wrong with any revolution. In the end, at least in this book, the only happy people aren't the ones with money, but the ones who do nice things for each other.

There are some flaws here, most notably a plot twist that Vonnegut gives away much too soon, but it's still a fine book. It succeeds in moving us without preaching, and in lifting the spirits even at its most pessimistic. We don't need money or revolutions or science or even love to make life better, Vonnegut tells us. All we really need is kindness and simple decency to each other. They may not save the world, but they're about the only things that make it tolerable.

Sol Louis Siegel

Pretty Pictures

Once upon a time there were two brothers who drew pretty pictures for the Moguls, Tolkien and Lucas, that they would turn them into gold in the guise of Star Wars posters and Lord of the Rings calendars. "Gawl!" said one brother. "Why don't we write and illustrate our own book?" "Damn!" said the other. "What stories we could tell!" "And what money you could make," said their agent.

Thus the brothers Hildebrant labored mightily, and brought forth Urshurak (Bantam, $8.95), with writer Jerry Nichols helping in the delivery. Urshurak is coolly calculated to separate foolish sword and sorcery fans from their $8.95, from the frontispiece ("full color Urshurak posters...just send $5.00") on. The narrative, like the cover, is a full-blown menagerie, with something for everyone: Elves, Dwarves, Hobbits, Robin Hood, Amazons, Vikings, Nubians, winged unicorns—and those are just the good guys. We even get two wizards, hurling enough deus ex machinas about to keep even the most bumbling heroes out of trouble.

Zyra, Amazon princess in Urshurak

In fact, Urshurak is downright annoying in its constant pandering to the lowest common denominator of liberal Seventies alternative consciousness: we are told (but not shown) that ecology is good, becoming one with something (anything) is good, sexism is bad, reason is bad, technology is very bad, except when used to slaughter evil (bad) and gain freedom (good).

The complexity of theme and depth of character that make Tolkien's trilogy a classic are nowhere to be found in these expensive pages. There is instead a happy land where the capacity for extreme destruction does not corrupt, where the bad guys are pronounced evil and live in an evil-looking city that could pass for Gary, Indiana on a bad day, though they don't really seem to do anything worse than put people to work. Tolkien's quest is a metaphoric rite of passage from childhood innocence to the mixed blessing of adult maturity—this sortie is little more than a sophomoric search-and-destroy mission, punctuated by beer drinking and hell raising. But then, this is supposed to be fantasy.

The book is nearly redeemed by the Hildebrants' illustrations. Their work, especially in the 12 color plates, is at once photographic in detail and surrealistic in color and composition. Their fantasy is rooted in reality, which makes it all the more arresting. They capture dawns and dusks in which even commonplace objects are transformed. Shadows are long and luminescent, skies chartreuse and turquoise; clouds hover eerily like purple and orange UFOs. Their paintings succeed because, unlike the Lord of the Rings illustrations, these do not have to compete with our pre-conceived notions of what the characters and settings look like. The pictures shine so brightly that they overpower the limp and often ludicrous prose, which is little more than a crudely sketched screenplay (the brothers conceived this story as both novel and film, and no doubt a rotoscoped epic is in the offing), hurrying along with great violence and little sense. Most readers will gladly let themselves be left behind, gazing at the pretty pictures.

Michael Ward

Folk, Rock & Disco

Taken together, side by side, these three books—Baby, Let Me Follow You Down: The Illustrated Story of the Cambridge Folk Years by Eric von Schmidt & Jim Rooney (Anchor, $8.95), Born to Run: The Bruce Springsteen Story by Dave Marsh (Doubleday Dolphin, $7.95) and The Complete Book on Disco and Ballroom Dancing by Ann T. Kilbride & A. Algoso (Hwong, $7.95)—make absolutely no sense at all.

The first is a voluminous compendium of photographs, drawings, anecdotes and "I was there" reportage of the late Fifties/early Sixties Cambridge folk era, when pimply, skinny kids like Bob Dylan, Eric Andersen, Joan Baez and Tom Rush used to sit around in coffee houses playing their guitars, scribbling lines like "Thirsty boots" and "From the crossroads of my doorstep my eyes start to fade" on torn-up pieces of paper.

Baby, Let Me Follow You Down is, if not an essential book, at least one no one will regret having purchased. The authors reminisce, recount and recreate the amoeba-like group's romantic intertwinings (Dylan and Baez, Eric and Debbie Andersen, Richard and Mimi Farina, Geoff and Maria Muldaur), the musical intertwinings (rural bluesmen meet rich kid Bonnie Raitt, hillbillies meet Paul Butterfield's Blues Band, and so on) and the many eccentrics and outright weirdos who were part of the scene (remember Mel Lyman from Kweskin's Jug Band—Cambridge's answer to Charles Manson?). Somehow, Baby ties it all up into a happy, sentimental oversized hodge-podge, managing to throw in the Chambers Brothers, the Lovin' Spoonful and Peter, Paul and Mary for good measure.

Born to Run is a picture-permeated fan's book on Bruce Springsteen, chronicling his early Asbury Park days (Marsh points out that Springsteen actually grew up in Freehold, New Jersey, about fifteen miles inland from Asbury Park—Ha! Another myth squashed!), his apprenticeship in local bar bands like Steel Mill, and then on to his bumpy ride to the summit of rock & roll stardom. Marsh, with a minimum of hype and hyperbole, has carefully and earnestly documented Springsteen's career, enhanced with healthy dollops of biographica straight from the horse's mouth. Marsh lays out the Time and Newsweek cover boy's life story (including all the ill effects resulting from that media overkill) and in doing so manages to document the evolution of rock itself, from its Sixties innocence to its Seventies cynicism.

The Disco book is self-explanatory. Two-hundred-and-eighty pages of dance steps (diagrammed in left foot, right foot, dot-dot-dot graphics) and photos of these two natty ethnic-type couples doing endless variations on the Hustle, the Salsa, the Slow Disco, the Bump, the Freak, the Ride-A-Bike and "free style" dances like the Split Pivots, Taxi Driver (wherein the dancer shaves his head Mohawk-style, packs some mean hardware and attempts to assassinate a well-known politician) and Dolphin Rolls (which everybody knows are what dolphins eat for breakfast). The introduction features a "Historical Roots of Dance," with photos of scantily clad African tribespeople doing war stomps around a fire.

In fact, taken together, these three books do make some sense. The comaraderie, the new consciousness and innocence manifested by the Cambridge folksters strikes a sharp contrast to the awesome pressures the pop music industry has plopped on its media-made superstars like Springsteen. That late Seventies causticity, in turn, pales next to the anesthetized, robotized decadence of the cocaine, Qaalude and spray-on Spandex disco world.

Steven X. Rea

Murder: Fact & Fiction

Perhaps that eminent sleuth Sherlock Holmes said it best: "life is infinitely stranger than anything that the mind of man could invent...the things which are really mere commonplaces of existence, make all fiction with its conventionalities and foreseen conclusions most stale and unprofitable." The point is, when it comes to murder, verifiable atrocities are irrepressibly repulsive and intriguing when compared to the casual wanderings of the imagination.

The recent release of two books devoted to this same curiosity in homicide offers a choice example. In Best Detective Stories of the Year – 1979 (E. P. Dutton, $9.95), we have an idiosyncratic selection of 16 short-story mysteries by editor Edward Hoch, whose own story, written from the criminal's viewpoint, is one of the more charming. Published annually for the past 33 years, the anthology picks from mystery magazines and is designed for the hard-core buffs who thirst for young, award-winning talent in the field of fiction.

On the other hand we have The Murderer's Who's Who (Methuen, Inc., $17.95), a work of substantially more import from J.H.H. Gaute and Robin Odell. (Yes, it's unfair to compare fiction with compendiums of fact, but such are their fates on this occasion.) While the Who's Who is not the first of its kind (Colin Wilson's Encyclopedia of Murder, still the definitive reference tool, and Jay Nalsh's Bloodletters and Badmen come to mind), the work entails a new dimension in recording the history of murder: a cross reference system by which a listing of sources is offered for each case. One doesn't have to scramble to locate several references on, say, Albert Fish, who acknowledged at least 100 crimes involving dismemberment and cannibalism before being electrocuted at Sing Sing. Or Amelia Dyer, executed in 1896 for strangling 7 (if not more) children with tape and then tossing their bodies in a river. Or...

November's Ampersand of the Month is a turkey (no smart remarks) from Karen C. Copeland of Hillsborough, NC, who will receive $25.

With a further innovation, a classified index of cases, the Who's Who is undeniably a valuable tool for the morbid soul and a fine addition to the literature of murder. Gaute and Odell are not trying to be comprehensive; they deal with over 650 notorious or law-changing cases in a way which presumes a socio-psychological bias. Apparently the authors are infatuated (like Mr. Holmes) with the philosophy of murder, and in the Who's Who we reap the benefits of their scholarly ardor.

Best Detective Stories is neither inappropriate nor uninspiring; writers like Brian Garfield, Frank Sisk and Barbara Owens have contributed tales of cunning and worth, and Mr. Hoch's comments relieve us of historical ignorance. But the intellectual allure of murder, which is as old as the first murderer, seems more accessible and significant as a science than as a hobby.

Science Fiction & The Not-So-Bizarre

Regular readers of science fiction probably already know about Best Science Fiction Stories of the Year, edited by Gardner Dozois (Dutton, $9.95), but even the occasional dabbler in SF should definitely look into this book; it lives up to its title.

The eighth annual collection of this "Best SF" series has the cream of the crop for 1978: among the eleven stories are John Varley's "The Persistence of Vision," Christopher Priest's "Whores," Joan D. Vinge's "View from a Height" and Gene Wolfe's prophetic short novel "Seven American Nights," along with lesser, though still rewarding, efforts by Isaac Asimov, Thomas M. Disch, Gregory Benford and several others. The Varley story alone is an instant classic, winning a Nebula award and appearing already in 1979 Annual World's Best SF from DAW Books, as well as headlining a collection of Varley's stories.

Editor Dozios not only selects the best SF stories for us, he also gives a detailed overview of the field in an excellent introduction, giving current information about the top writers, editors and magazines. There are also brief biographical introductions to each of the stories, as is common in SF anthologies, and a list of 90 honorable mentions—stories that might have been the best if Varley and company had bombed.

Since many SF readers are also fans of the bizarre, they should beware Harold E. Priestley's Truly Bizarre (Sterling, $8.95), a rambling collection of "believe-it-or-not" trivia that is rarely bizarre and usually not even interesting. Truly Bizarre is a lead balloon—put your money into the SF collection and you're way ahead.

Many Elements, Not That Much Style

When E. B. White published his famous New Yorker essay on his former professor's writing textbook in 1957, it provoked so much excitement that White revised the book for contemporary use. The Elements of Style, by William Strunk Jr. and E. B. White, is now in its third edition (Macmillan, $1.95), and this one promises to be as popular as the first two. One reason for the book's immediate success was the implicit promise White's essay—now the Introduction — seemed to hold: follow these rules, avoid these missteps, and you too can learn how to write. The debate on student and general illiteracy was already strong in the Fifties, and this ancient text with its brief prescriptions could possibly come to the rescue.

Alas, it didn't work out that way. It was naive, and still is, to think that this book, or any other, could do much to improve writing in an increasingly non-writing, non-reading culture. Moreover, it isn't really a very good book. It's a hodgepodge of "rules of usage" (e.g., "Form the possessive singular of nouns by adding 's"..."The number of the subject determines the number of the verb") and "principles of composition" ("Use the active voice"..."Avoid a succession of loose sentences"). This is all good advice but no better than that given by thousands of textbooks.

Another flaw is a certain affectation, an archness, an occasional metaphorical turn that is meant to be crisp but calls attention to itself in a way the book warns against doing: "There are occasions when obscurity serves a literary yearning, if not a literary purpose, and there are writers whose mien is more overcast than clear." Or, in a passage criticizing such business words as update and finalize: "Its portentous nouns and verbs invest ordinary events with high adventure; the executive walks among ink erasers, caparisoned like a knight. We should tolerate him — every man of spirit wants to ride a white horse. The only question is whether his vocabulary is helpful to ordinary prose." The only question I have is whether this kind of prose is helpful to ordinary students. Each example suffers from a certain cuteness and incidentally violates two of the book's rules: "Use figures of speech sparingly" and "Avoid fancy words."

This takes me to "Words and Expressions Commonly Misused," a chapter White has revised for this edition. Though he gives much good advice for avoiding vague or confusing words, he is cranky much of the time. White's prejudice is against newer words and shifts of meaning. Nauseous should not be used for nauseated; it means "sickening to contemplate." Most people would disagree. Transpire means to "become known," not to "happen" or "come to pass." "Many writers so use it..." he says, "but their usage finds little support in the Latin 'breathe across or through!" This is proof?

Then there's cope. White says it's an "intransitive verb used with with." But that ignores the new use of the term: "How's he doing after the divorce?" "Oh, he's coping." To be sure, this comes close to the dread psychobabble, but it still expresses something unique and valuable — as do many of the new jargon words, however irritating or overused, such as closure, space, validation.

Finally, there's the matter of hopefully. White: "To say, 'Hopefully I'll leave on the noon plane' is to talk nonsense. Do you mean you'll leave on the noon plane in a hopeful frame of mind? Or do you mean you hope you'll leave on the noon plane?" Sorry, but I think White is willfully uncomprehending. We know perfectly well that this means he hopes he'll leave on the noon plane.

For all its lightness and wit, The Elements of Style, in whatever edition, is often sour and wrongheaded. I don't deny that we can learn from it, but the book does not have enough to do with the language as it is actually used, and it has an offensive way of celebrating its own stuffiness.

IN BOTH EARS

Of all the components you buy for your hi/fi system, the only ones that absolutely require reliance on the manufacturer's performance and capability promises are the speakers. A listening test in a dealer's demo room may give you a feeling of accomplishment, may act as a psychological crutch, but as a valid test its value is zilch.

What you think you hear from a pair of speakers depends not only on the speakers, but also where they are positioned, your age and your sex. Even more important are the acoustic properties of your listening room. If you want to know what sort of sound your fi system is delivering, a pair of top quality headphones will give you an approximate idea, but even such a test has its limitations since the headpohones plus your ear cavity form a sort of resonating chamber, a room in miniature.

Your hi/fi listening room always interfaces with your speakers, forming an indissoluble partnership. What you actually hear is what is left over after your room gets through with the sound. As far as fi sound is concerned, you are the last person in the hi/fi chain of events, low man on the sonic totem pole.

Several things take place in your listening room, and for openers we can consider sound as existing in two categories. The first is dry sound, the sound that comes directly from your speakers. Dry sound or direct sound is what a musician hears from his instrument. This sound travels out into space, strikes walls, the floor, ceiling, chairs, rugs, furniture and people. Some of the sound bounces off, scattering in all directions. This reflected or reverberant sound is a sound source, just like your speakers.

All the objects in your listening room reflect a certain amount of sound, but also absorb some of it, converting it to heat, while letting some of the sound pass through. An open window, excluding the frame and glass, does no sound absorbing, permitting sound to travel on through, unrestricted. Close the window and that pane of glass becomes a sound reflector.

Offhand, it would seem that reflected sound, the reverberant sound, is the villain of the piece, yet consider that sound indoors is always more satisfying than the same sound heard at an outdoor concert. What our ears and our brains like to hear is a combination of direct and reverberant sound. Reverberant sound adds a certain richness and body to music it does not otherwise have. The amount and quality of reverberant sound depends on the size of your listening room, its shape and the sound absorption properties of everything in that room.

You can have too much reverberation or not enough but there is no such thing as a proper amount and there are no rigid rules to which you must adhere. The kind of sound, the combination of direct and reverberant sound your speakers and your listening room produce and which you may enjoy is a subjective experience. If the reverberation isn't quite right for you personally, then your speakers will not sound right no matter what. The same speakers in a different listening environment may sound like the best you ever heard.

Ideally, when listening to a composition you should get a mental image of the space in which it was performed. A symphony should give the impression of being played in a large hall; an organ in a cathedral and chamber music in an intimate room. There is no way in which your listening room, unaided, will do all these things for you.

Reverberant sound can produce problems. Two sounds can augment or negate each other. Where they assist those frequencies sound louder; where they oppose they can become inaudible. These actions occur at various places in the room, so what you hear is determined by your speakers, their positioning, by the acoustics and by where you sit. The same is true when you attend a concert: what you hear depends on where you sit. If, at a live performance speech sounds muffled or some of the instrumental music sounds muddy, change your seat. Ditto at home.

You can modify reverberant sound to some extent. You can make your room more lively, more reverberant, by removing materials which are notorious sound absorbers. You can put your speakers on stands, either homemade or of the storebought variety. This stops the reverberation of floorboards, which muddies up bass response, and gives treble tones better direction. The result: cleaner sound at both ends of the spectrum. An empty room with hard walls, closed windows, no curtains and with no one present but yourself will give maximum reverberant sound. This decreases as you add furniture, carpeting, people and open all the windows. Alternatively, you can add a time delay device to your fi system to add artificial reverb. If you do, use additional speakers at the sides and rear to supply reverberant sound only.

tour this November to talk about — black holes. Dr. Kaufmann, astrophysicist and black hole expert, will arrive with films, slides, diagrams and "spectacular astronomical photographs," and it's all part of the Big Push for Disney's most expensive movie ever, The Black Hole, opening in December.

Yawn

Saturday Night Not Live: NBC is moving reruns of their late night silliness to prime time — Wednesday, 10-11, thereby ousting From Here to Eternity from the fall schedule. It will be optimistically titled The Best of Saturday Night Live.

The Marshall Tucker Band, Spartansburg, South Carolina's contribution to the deep-South boogie brigades, was recently named Official Ambassadors to the Winter Olympics. In exchange for their high-falutin' title, the lads are obliged to throw a fund-raising show for the U.S. team and a free concert for the whole gang of competitors when they assemble next winter at Lake Placid, New York.

Casting Calls

Monty Python's John Cleese will play Count de Monet in the French Revolution segment of Mel Brooks' History of the World, Part I. Cloris Leachman will play Madame de Farge, Brooks himself will be a chamber pot valet (ah, toilet humor through the ages).

Blondie will appear in the film Roadie; they'll do a concert number and Deborah Harry will do even more ... a featured role. The star of this effort is Meat Loaf, director is Alan (Welcome to L.A.) Rudolph. Mick Jagger, Tatum O'Neal, Orson Welles and Jackie Gleason reportedly turned down roles. This acting gig, by the way, will further delay completion of Meat Loaf's long overdue album; it was scheduled for release early this year and is nowhere near finished.

Robert Redford's first directorial effort, Ordinary People (from the best seller of a few years back) stars Mary Tyler Moore and Donald Southerland. Cutter & Bone will star John Heard as Cutter, Jeff Bridges as Bone, Lisa Eichhorn as Mo.

Exploiting the Exploitive

Some enterprising types put together a cute little flick called Guyana, Crime of the Century, and then even got Universal to agree to distribute ... but Universal is suddenly shy. The movie is now called Guyana, Mystery of the Century, and although the original dialogue was in English, the entire movie has been redubbed. (The stars, and we use the term loosely, are Stuart Whitman, Gene Barry, John Ireland, Joseph Cotten, Yvonne de Carlo and Bradford Dillman.) This sudden attack of cold feet may prove that there are limits to Hollywood's tastelessness.

Bantam Books is re-releasing its paperback version of the original Cruising novel by Gerald Walker. Mere coincidence, swears Bantam, that the uproar over the film version should so closely precede the January publication date (book's been out of print since it first emerged in 1970).

A film titled Chappaquiddick, using Ted Kennedy's name, will allegedly be made by one Glenn Stensel, who claims it's all perfectly OK, since, after all, Kennedy is a public figure and fair game. Stensel was once going to make a film about Billy Carter called Peanuts, but we were spared that one.

At last, Encare.®
Neat, compact, no bigger than your fingertip, Encare is fast becoming the most talked about contraceptive we have today.

Free from hormonal side effects, Encare is available without a prescription. And it might well be the easiest method of birth control you will ever use.

Simply simple.
You simply insert Encare with the tip of your finger. There's no iffy measuring, no tubes, no applicators. And no messy paraphernalia to clean up afterward. Each tiny insert contains an exact, premeasured amount of the clinically proven spermicide, nonoxynol 9.

Simply effective.
Very simply, Encare works by neutralizing sperm. When used properly, Encare melts and gently effervesces, spreading within your vagina for protection against pregnancy.

Even under very rigorous testing conditions, Encare's spermicide was found to be highly effective.

Simply safe.
And if you ask your gynecologist about Encare, you'll be reassured to hear that Encare cannot harm your body the way the pill or IUD might.

Which means, you simply won't be worried about those complications.

For maximum protection, it is essential that you read and follow directions carefully and, if indicated, consult your physician. No birth control method is guaranteed to prevent pregnancy.

Birth control, simplified.

Technics
SILVER EDITION

With some cassette decks you can start off with impressive performance and impressive features, and end up with recordings that are far from impressive. Because to make an accurate recording, you need accurate meters.

And that's just what you get with Technics RS-M11, RS-M18 and RS-M22. Because all three cassette decks have the same fluorescent [FL] bar-graph meters you'll find in our most expensive cassette decks. And that means you can make recordings that are full of dynamic range. Not noise and distortion.

The reasons: The accuracy of our FL meters. They're completely electronic and extremely fast. So fast they have a device attack time of just five millionths of a second. What it all adds up to is a 0 VU level deviation of no more than 0.1 dB. So what you see on the meters, you'll hear on the tape.

Model	Wow and Flutter	Frequency Response	S/N
RS-M11	0.07% (WRMS)	30-15kHz(FeCr, Cr02)	66 dB Dolby in
RS-M18	0.06% (WRMS)	30-16kHz(FeCr, Cr02)	66 dB Dolby in
RS-M22	0.05% (WRMS)	30-16kHz(FeCr, Cr02)	67 dB Dolby in

And what you'll hear, you'll like. You'll like our LH record/playback head and low-noise, high-linearity equalizer amp. Together they deliver a frequency response that's flat and wide. You'll also like Dolby* NR because it reduces something you don't like: Tape hiss.

But tape hiss is only one thing you don't want to hear. Wow and flutter is another. And since all three decks have electronically controlled DC motors, they also have inaudible wow and flutter.

All three decks have full auto-stop and three-position tape selectors, while the RS-M18 and RS-M22 add separate three-position bias and EQ selectors, rewind auto-play and cue and review.

Technics RS-M11, RS-M18 and RS-M22. All with performance worthy of our most accurate meters.

'Just Friends of 1923' musical premieres and succeeds

By JANET HALPIN
Collegian Staff

The world premier of 'Just Friends of 1923,' which was written by former UMass student Peter Niemezura, was presented this weekend by the UMass Music Theatre Guild with innovation, humor and a wealth of talent.

The heavily publicized musical played to enthusiastic audiences last weekend and will be presented again this Thursday, Friday and Saturday night in Bowker Auditorium at 8 p.m.

It is directed by UMass senior Peter Tolan, who has a string of musical successes at UMass, choreographed by junior Mark Kittlaus and sophomore Lois O'Brian and the musical director is Cory Grolman. The cast is composed of UMass students and five women from Smith College.

Niemezura, who authored the plav last year, not onlv composed the music anc wrote the lyrics but designed and made a stunning array of period costumes as well.

The play concerns the zany misadventures of a newly wealthy widow Zelda Van Welltadew and her still-quarrelsome children Eulalia and Reggie. Johanna Sherwood as Zelda easily won the audience over with her perfect comic timing and colorful expressions. She had the audience on her side all the way as she attempted to keep her whacky family happily in line.

Zelda's daughter is in love with a Benton Worthalot, played by promising freshman Rand McNally Sutton, who finds his stocks and bonds much more intrigueing. But Eulalia, played by Smith student Tracy E. Heil, who has a stunning voice, refuses to be daunted. At the same time Reggie, played with energy by Paul Mulcahy, is falling in love with Benton's sister Chloe, played by a lovely Jody Thomas.

Zelda decides to give Eulalia a coming-out party in hopes that she will meet many men and influential people, but ends up with a misplaced sheik, played by talented veteran Scott Cunningham, and his harem as houseguests.

Throw in a butler from Brooklyn with a French accent, a cook who tells her employers what to do, and a forever smiling chorus that pops into the living room mid-song and you can understand why Zelda is so flaky. You can also understand why the audience is constantly laughing.

Proposed tax reform could cut UM budget

By PETER SMERDON
Collegian Staff

The 1980 election could bring even harder times to UMass say some.

But now there are two referendum proposals underway that oppose an initial tax cut proposal which, if passed, would devestate state education in Massachusetts, said Alvrid Muller of the Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy (SCERA) on Friday.

Proposition 2½, an out-growth from California's Proposition 13 "tax revolt", would, among other things, limit local property taxes to 2½ percent of its "fair market value". Muller said the cuts following this "would have a disastrous effect on the University...leading to a cut in the UMass budget of about 30 percent."

Proposition 2½ is opposed by both a labor-supported "Tax Justice Act" and a Massachusetts' Teachers' Association (MTA) proposal, both of which are being publicized by a petition drive organized by SCERA.

There will be a SCERA table in the Campus Center Concourse on Tuesday, Thursday and Friday of next week, where Massachusetts registered voters can sign petitions in favor of the alternative proposals.

The petitions must have 60,000 signatures each to be included as referendum proposals on the 1980 state ballot paper.

The opposition to Proposition 2½ is alarmed by the effect of California's Proposition 13 in June 1978, which rolled back the maximum tax rate to one per cent of 1975-76 assessments. Elinor Lipman of the MTA contends that "the supporters of that infamous referendum didn't mean to hurt education in California, but...by last March some 60,000 teachers had received lay-off notices."

Gregory Hyatt, executive director of "Citizens for Limited Taxation," who support Proposition 2½, said on Friday, "It is conceivable that teachers would be fired, but it is not at all clear that you receive a good education just by throwing millions of dollars at children."

The MTA proposal would limit state and local tax increases to the percentage rise of personal income in the state, as well as increasing the state's share of local education costs. Lipman said, "The MTA proposal allows for modest increases in local and state budgets so that the ravages of inflation are checked and the quality of public services are preserved."

The "Tax Justice Act", supported by a broad coalition of citizen and labor organizations, would cut residential property taxes in most of the state by 15 percent, while guaranteeing local aid. Additional state revenues would be provided by closing tax loopholes to corporations.

The referendum proposals that finally appear on the 1980 ballot will only need a majority vote in order to become law. Muller contends that the "Tax Justice Act" and the MTA proposal "are both valid alternatives to Proposition 2½, they are not in conflict, in fact, they compliment each other."

Gregory Hyatt, of the limited tax group, said the alternatives to Proposition 2½ were "well-intentioned, but very mis-guided. They just don't understand the plight of taxpayers in Massachusetts...who are mad."

Admissions staff divides responsibilities

By RON MILLER
Collegian Staff

Students accepted to UMass are chosen from a pool of over 12,000 applicants and the decision to accept them is made by one of six people on the admissions staff.

According to Director of Freshmen Admissions Diedre L. Kedesdy, each person on the admissions staff is responsible for a certain section of the alphabet. Each member of the staff also takes a professional school — i.e. business, engineering, nursing etc. — and each decides who to accept. "It is not done by committee; each of the six people look at a pile," Kedesdy said.

"In the professional applications you're looking for specific preparation. An engineer with no high school physics won't work," Kedesdy said.

For the fall of 1979 the University received 12,648 applications. Of these 10,319 were from in-state residents and 2,331 were from out-of-state. Out of these, 3,890 were accepted for the freshman class, according to Kedesdy.

Freshman admissions is based mostly on the high school record. "Class rank is more important than your average. What we're looking for is a stable or upward trend from the freshman to senior year. We don't want to have the senior year thrown away," Kedesdy said.

"SAT scores are a small factor. Rarely is a strong student excluded for bad SAT scores," Kedesdy said.

"What we look for is students in the top 40 percent of their class. Extra activities are helpful, but only on border applications. We would rather seen an economically poor student who had to work to help support the family than a list of activities. This kind of person is a better college risk," Kedesdy said.

A student from a private high school will not automatically be chosen over a student from a public school according to Kedesdy. "We've rejected students from private schools before," Kedesdy said.

"You see worse grades at private schools because they have to work harder. The courses are more difficult. If (a student) got a "C" from Roxbury Latin, he worked for it," Kedesdy said.

Kedesdy said she will not accept athletes if they do not pass the admissions criteria. "It is inconceivable to accept a student who is going to be brought in to exploit the university," Kedesdy said. She said that goes for children of alumni also. "I've turned down children of alumni before," Kedesdy said.

Kedesdy sighted statistics that show over a ten year period 63.7 percent of the students who enroll at the University receive a degree. "Some take longer to get a degree. More students are stopping out, not dropping out," Kedesdy said. They are taking off, she said, then returning to finish the requirements for their degree.

Transfers also represent a large number of newcomers to the campus each semester. According to Kathy L. Ryan, Director of Transfer Affairs, 1600 transfer students enrolled this fall. The criteria for transfers is different from that of the entering freshman, she said.

Like freshman applicants, all transfer applications are checked by an individual member of the five member transfer staff. They check the grade point average, the caliber of courses taken and the level of courses, according to Ryan.

"About one-third of transfers come from community colleges, and two year private schools; one-third from four-year state schools and one-third from four-year private schools. Because of high costs, growing numbers are coming from private four-year schools," Ryan said.

"The more college credits an applicant has the less likely we are to look at their high school record," Ryan said. If a student has been out of high school a long time the high school record becomes less important, but if there is a student who wants to major in science, and has no college science courses then admissions look at the high school record more carefully, according to Ryan.

Ryan echoed Kedesdy's statements about students taking time off during their education, "A growing number of transfers have had a gap in their education," Ryan said.

Cabinet may include energy

BOSTON [AP] – The Massachusetts Legislature approved a bill upgrading the state Energy Office to cabinet status before adjourning for the year yesterday.

The bill also appropriates $20 million for various energy and conservation programs and authorizes a bond issue of $6 million for energy conservation renovations at state institutions.

Additionally, it exempts wood burning furnaces which cost more than $900 from the state sales tax, and it provides tax incentives for homeowners who install solar or wind powered energy systems.

House votes on welfare bill

WASHINGTON [AP] – The House votes this week on President Carter's welfare-revision bill, which would put a definite payment floor under many welfare recipients for the first time.

In a tactical vote last week, Republicans who oppose the bill – and there are a lot of them – lost their chance to try to modify it much on the House floor. The House voted 209-177 to limit amendments severely, assuring a final vote on the version approved by the Ways and Means Committee.

ERA as issue advocated

MANCHESTER, N.H. [AP] – Eleanor Smeal, head of the National Organization for Women, said yesterday that it's time for the Equal Rights Amendment to become a central issue.

Smeal addressed a rally that included a five-mile walkathon to raise money for passage of ERA in states where it has not been enacted.

She said the media and politicians have treated the ERA as a side issue.

Protestors of shah in U.S. occupy Statue of Liberty

Associated Press

NEW YORK – Seven demonstrators, protesting the deposed shah of Iran's presence in the United States, chained themselves in the Statue of Liberty's crown for three and a half hours yesterday before authorities cut the chains and took them into custody.

The seven were being questioned by National Park Service officials on Liberty Island. They did not resist, according to Ellen Britton, acting superintendent of the national park in New York harbor.

Ms. Britton had said about 30 persons were involved in the demonstration, but she said later there were only seven.

She said she was not certain what charges may be filed against the seven, whose identities were not available.

The island was closed to the public throughout the demonstration, and Ms. Britton said the island and statue would remain closed for the rest of the day.

Bahram Nahidian, a spokesman for the Persian Speaking Group of the Moselm Students Association of the United States and Canada, said the demonstrators were "protesting the shah's presence in New York."

The shah came to New York from Mexico last month for a gall bladder operation. He remains in New York HospitalCornell Medical Center for treatment of lymphoma, a cancer of the lymph glands.

The government of the Ayatollah Khomeini has demanded that the shah be deported to Iran to face charges, and Sunday a group of Iranian students took over the American embassy in Tehran and said they would not surrender the building until the shah was returned home.

Nahidian said he did not think the protesters in the Statue of Liberty were in "direct contact" with the Iranian students who took over the embassy.

He said the demonstrators in the statue had planned to "stay there as long as they can. I think the police will step in and take them away. They will not fight back, they will go quietly."

Drinan speaks on U.S.-Israel

By MARK CURELOP
Collegian Staff

The United States has a "unique military obligation" to Israel, Congressman Reverend Robert F. Drinan told an audience of 100 people at the Student Union Ballroom during a Hillel sponsored lecture yesterday.

This year, Israel has requested a $3.5 billion from the U.S. to finance its defense against the surrounding Arab nations, he said.

"There may be serious problems in Israel and the Soviet Union this year to come," said the representative of the Fourth Congressional District.

"Zionism intended to bring a safe place for people to live in Israel, yet the people have lived through four wars," he said, referring to the wars between Israel and her Arab neighbors in 1948, 1956, 1967, and the Yom Kippur War of 1973.

Despite the 100 percent inflation rate that is currently ripping Israel's economy, Prime Minister Menachim Begin has had his accomplishments in the past two years—the largest being the Peace Summit between Israel and Egypt at Camp David this past year, Drinan said.

Drinan raised the question of the Palestinian Liberation Organization's claim to the West Bank homeland occupied by Israel. "The PLO is a terrorist organization," he said. "Should the blacks negotiate with the Ku Klux Klan? Then why should Israel try to bargain with the PLO who will try to kill them?"

Drinan cited statistics that Israel has been bombed "1,000 times" over the past six years from Lebanon with Russian made equipment resulting in the death of 108 Israelites. "If this were happening on the same level in the US with either Canada or Mexico, bombing Michigan or the Gulf of Mexico, the deaths would exceed 10,000.

The US would intervene immediately ordering the country to stop the bombings, not sitting down for months for negotiations with the other side," he said.

Soviet Jewry was the second topic of Drinan's talk. "In 1969 over 111,000 Jews were in college programs in the Soviet Union, in 1979, only 67,000 Jews were admitted into degree type programs," he said.

Congressman Drinan said the President's Committee on the Holocaust recommended that a memorial to the Holocaust be erected in Washington, D.C. so that no one will ever forget the horrors Jews suffered in World War II.

During a question and answer period after his initial speech, the Congressman expressed concern over starving refugees in Cambodia. He said that an airlift would not work because it would look as if the United States is supporting one side of the civil conflict.

In regards to the recent campaign of Senator Edward M. Kennedy, Drinan did not come out and openly support either the Massachusetts senator or President Carter.

"Everyone supports the favorite son," was Drinan's only comment.

Committee to rank AG candidates

By ED LEVINE
Collegian Staff

Student Government Association co-president Rich LaVoice said Friday he would ask the Attorney General search committee to reconvene this week and rank their chosen candidates in order of preference.

Last week LaVoice and co-president Brian Burke appointed Jon Hensleigh to the position, but he was rejected by the Student Senate. Hensleigh was chosen by the co-presidents from a list of three people—Hensleigh, Ann Bolger and Julie Robertson—recommended by the search committee. The three were not ranked by the search committee which expressed no favorite to the co-presidents.

Burke and LaVoice must return to the Senate this Wednesday and present a new nomination for the position. LaVoice said he and Burke would interview all three candidates, which they did not have the opportunity to do last week.

Both Burke and LaVoice would not rule out the possibility of re-appointing Hensleigh.

One member of the search committee said the committee votes placed Hensleigh first, followed by Bolger and Robertson. He said the three candidates would probably be ranked in that order.

Accounting Transition

The Transition Review Team, established by Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs Dennis L. Madson to monitor the planned switch over of the student activities accounting system to the University accounting system, will meet for the first time today.

The team—comprised of Burke, Student Senate Treasurer William Fitzgerald, Director of Student Activities O.C. Bobby Daniels, Director of Student Services W. Daniel Fitzpatrick, the Student Affairs budget coordinator, the chairperson of the Senate Budget Committee, representatives from the Recognized Student Organization business office, from the campus controller and from the University Procurement office—will determine policies for the transition and recommend deviations from University accounting policies where necessary.

Senate Treasurer Fitzgerald last week questioned the organization of the committee. "We have problems with some of the people on it," he said, "the administration picked the members in an obvious attempt to take away our power."

Fitzgerald said he would also like to have some of his assistants on the committee. "This should be a technical committee," he said, "they picked political people to be on it. We have problems with Daniels and Fitzgerald. They're political people."

He said current plans require all spending to be cleared through Daniels' office. "They're trying to make student government into a department where the director signs off. But, as LaVoice says—is this the Student Activities Trust Fund or the O.C. Bobby Daniels Trust Fund?"

Daniels refused to comment last week.

Drinking age study proposed

A committee to study the effects the increase in the drinking age has had upon UMass students is being formed through the UMass President's Office. The committee, to be chaired by Student Aide Skip Carbin will research incidents such as arrest and vandalism on campus, in an effort to formulate some answers.

Inspired by SGA Co-President Rich LaVoice, the committee will consist of a representative from the ViceChancellor's staff, Mental Health, the Department of Public Safety, and the Area Governments. Also included will be a Head of Residence, three Student Senators, and two students-at-large.

Carbin said on Thursday he does not have any specific research outlined, but plans to send questionairres to students, interviewing residence assistants, and distributing literature to various facets of the administration. He said he wants to obtain an "overview" of the changes which may have resulted since the drinking age was raised to 20 last April.

A Community Resource Assistant at Greenough House, Carbin anticipates a great deal of "brainstorming" as soon as the committee members have all been selected. He said that the study will most likely continue into next semester.

Sound system theft, break-ins

By KAREN LIBUCHA
Collegian Staff

Two males claiming to be from the Black Mass Communication Project signed a rental agreement with false names and social security numbers Friday night and stole a $3,600 disco sound system, UMass police said.

A Leverett man delivered the equipment to the New Africa House and received a $100 cash deposit. When he returned to pick up the sound system, he found that there had been no disco and the entire system was gone, police said. The theft is under investigation.

There were "about seven" break-ins and larcenies between 4 and 5 a.m. Friday in North Village Apartments, police said, but they were unsure of the actual number because some people were away for the weekend.

Most of the victims were sleeping when the burglers pried open the locked sliding glass doors of the Amherst apartments, police said.

A pickup truck which was stolen from Puffton Village last Sunday was recovered in Leominster Saturday with some of the merchandise which was reported stolen from North Village Friday morning, police said.

Firemen extinguish flames in the engine of a Volkswagon which caught fire yesterday afternoon on North Pleasant Street. The driver of the auto, Adele Fox, and her passenger, George Lamson, both UMass undergraduates, were not injured. (Staff photo by Dennis Meunier)

King signs legislative pay raise

By STEVEN A. COHEN
Associated Press

BOSTON — With assurances that Gov. Edward J. King would declare their pay raise an emergency law -forestalling a repeal referendum — the Massachusetts Legislature adjourned its 1979 session yesterday.

King failed to win passage of a key bill aimed at mandating jail terms for drug traffickers. It reportedly had gotten "lost" in the Senate Ways and Means Committee and, for a time, threatened to jeopardize adiournment.

Earlier, King bowed to heavy pressure from legislative leaders and signed the pay raise bill into law. The action blocked a vote in the Senate that might have recalled the bill from the governor, and it cleared the way for an end to the long session.

The governor was asked if he planned to declare the law an emergency.

"There will be an emergency letter," the governor said. "I have not written it yet."

A small group of legislators opposed to the pay raise bill said a petition drive will be launched to repeal it at the 1980 state election. They had hoped to have the law suspended, until voters pass on it, but a spokesman said halting the raises is precluded by the governor's declaration of an emergency.

The Legislature adjourned for the year after pushing through scores of bills, including a $216 million capital outlay (public construction) budget which includes a $7 billion debt ceiling for the state, a $21.3 million supplemental state budget and a measure establishing a cabinet level Office of Energy Resources.

The Democratic leadership turned up the heat late Saturday night when Sen. David H. Locke, R-Wellesley, engaged in a series of parliamentary maneuvers which led to an order for a roll call vote on a motion to recall the bill from King's desk.

The Senate had managed to avoid a recorded vote in sending the bill to King following late night action earlier last week. The only way to avoid a roll call on Locke's motion Saturday was for King, who had said he wouldn't act on the measure until this week, to sign it immediately.

The bill gives massive raises to members of the legislative leadership, a $20,000 increase to the governor, which King said he would donate to charity, and raises of $10,000 each to the lieutenant governor, attorney general, and state secretary, treasurer and auditor.

"I think the wages are due," King said afterward in an interview with The Associated Press.

KKK

Kathy Daniels

Every day a new incidence of racial violence and/or injustice is disclosed in the newspapers—the Darryl Williams shooting, the stonings and assaults of black students participating in the busing program, the framing of Willie Saunders, the murders in Boston of twelve black women, and, in our own community, the Earl Brown and Craeman Gethers case, the murder and inconclusive trial of Seta Rampersad, and the latest melee involving three area Third World women and Russell's Liquor Store. The list could go on interminably. One could observe, and rightly so, that there is a war going on in our midst. This country is in a state of siege, and the Third World community is the target.

The massacre at Greensboro, North Carolina could not be a more blatant example of this.

For years the Ku Klux Klan has been reaping the benefits of the First Amendment—exercising repeatedly their right to free speech, i.e. their right to hate, their right to intimidate, their right to murder and oppress. In opposition to this dogma and in the face of evident risk, a group of people in North Carolina banded together to defend their constitutional rights. They stepped forward to denounce and challenge racism; to affirm life and the right to dignity, to decry death and legally-sanctioned genocide. And they were gunned down.

Make no mistake about it: This is not an exception to the rule, this is no unusual, isolated incident. The oppression of blacks and other Third World people, which began hundreds of years ago, permeates this society today, regardless of what many whites would like to believe about this "free nation" and the alleged strides taken to initiate equality between the races.

It is highly significant that Greensboro was the site of the first lunch counter sit-in in the 1960's. Less than twenty years ago blacks had to demand their right to sit and eat at the same counter as whites. Think about it—twenty years is not a very long time.

Just as suffrage did not free women from the bondage that has endured for centuries, neither did "Emancipation" release blacks from slavery. All the damage that has been perpetrated can never be undone. Lives that have been lost can never be restored. Pain that has been inflicted may never heal.

We have been told, from grammar school on, that free speech is the irrefutable right of every American citizen. The massacre at Greensboro proves to exemplify the fact that this right has existed only for the benefit of chosen individuals.

Despite increasing awareness of racism, it goes on. Whites have been silencing blacks for years, and the motivations are obvious. As the rapist often intimidates his victim into silence by the threat of violence, so have whites bullied blacks by the threat of retaliation. Violence is what the Ku Klux Klan stands for; and the fear of the truth is what their philosophy embodies. The Ku Klux Klan exists to keep blacks "in their place," because blacks have more than ample evidence with which to incriminate white culture and to expose it's basic principles of "liberty and justice for all" for being not only more questionable than they already are, but to prove them downright fraudulent.

I am sick of hearing white people say, "I didn't have anything to do with it. My relatives didn't have slaves. I never harmed a black person." We must face up to our history (it repeats itself, you know). We must recognize racism and our part in it, unwitting or not. By our words and actions, we must support the black struggle. Silence can be as diabolical as slander. The old adage is as true as ever: "If you're not part of the solution, you're part of the problem."

Despite the odds and despite the risks, blacks have insisted on their right to speak the truth—the joys and pains—of what it means to be black. Whether this has meant ostracism or death, they have persevered in their struggle. The very least we can do is listen...and be outraged.

Energy crisis: Who's to blame?

Kevin Sullivan

The present oil crisis reflects the unreality of the supposed "free" market of the U.S. It is now time that people recognize that the "free market system" is an anachronism. The system that exists is comprised of private, monopolistic industries which are protected and nurtured by the government. The government is composed of Democrats and Republicans who refuse to legislate on the behalf of a majority of Americans. Instead, they disregard the long-term interests of working Americans in order to satisfy the short-term, selfish interests of the corporate giants.

The government's complicity with the corporate giants in underscored by the absence of any concrete, coherent energy policy. While the government has been mouthing restraint and conservation among citizens, the automobile industry and the oil companies have been permitted to deliberately pursue wasteful energy policies. The automobile industry, for example, consciously builds high-fuel-consumption vehicles and even plans on their "built-in obsolescence." This perverse state of affairs persists despite the fact that the industry has possessed the technology to develop highly fuel-efficient vehicles averaging sixty miles per gallon for years.

The limited availability of world fossil fuel supplies has been general knowledge for decades, yet little has been done to utilize the technology we have developed to accommodate this situation in the future. Instead, corporations, as controllers of technology, have channeled technological development only into those areas which are most profitable. The result has been a serious neglect of the public interest.

Solar energy is a case in point. Solar energy which is decentralized and conducive to democratic control has been restrained in its development by those seeking to promote nuclear development which is centralized and conducive to oligarchic control. It is not unusual that corporate leaders are among the leading proponents of nuclear energy. The reason for this is that the sun is a power source which no one can own or control making solar energy much less attractive to a corporation seeking to corner markets and control a resource.

It is important to realize that those who control the use of our technology have not been acting in the best interests of the majority of Americans. In fact, they have intentionally squandered scarce resources in order to maximize profit and power.

It is disgusting to note that the government whose first responsibility is to advocate on behalf of the common good in a democracy, should instead betray the public interest by acting, for the most part, as an apologist for corporate giants tolerating policies which only serve to benefit the rich and powerful.

The time has come for citizens to demand change in the interest of fairness. Corporations should not be able to hold hostage the destinies of the American people. It is about time that they be made accountable to the people. U.S. citizens deserve a say in affairs which affect them intimately and directly. If the oil and automobile industry continue to deceive the public and refuse to recognize the majority's longterm needs, then they should be nationalized with representatives of the people being elected to decision-making positions within the industry. For now the choice lies with the corporation. If they refuse to act with wisdom, they may no longer enjoy that perogative.

Oil slick a rainbow of color

Gene Klos

As part of the festivities commemorating Black Tuesday, oil company spokesmen have indicated that a sizable sum will be made available to any politico willing to sell their soul to the "Texas Tea" concern.

I.M. Rich, grandfather of Lil' Richy Rich, a Blexxon vice-president in charge of consumer affairs, told a group of reporters that despite an increase in profits of 211 percent, his company would need a tax-incentive to continue to continue exploratory drilling. In answering a reporter's query on the booming profits Rich replied, "Look, I realize that a 211 percent third-quarter profit sounds rather large, but I am sure you are all aware of inflation. Why in real dollars that profit is a mere five trillion dollars! Have you any idea how much gasoline my Cadillac uses daily? And I can tell you these monogrammed shirts cost me a bundle. They don't even have buttons on the cuffs. My bill for cufflinks is enough to supply a university library with a lifetime supply of 40 watt lightbulbs.

After assuring members of the press that cocktails would be served immediately following, Rich denied allegations questioning the authenticity of an environmental-impact report currently being circulated by P.U. Rabid, the company's Washington lobbyist.

"We gave the famous Lil' Richy Rich, a noted environmentalist, six million dollars to produce that report. It deals with the impact of drilling in the Grand Banks area. He found that the fishing will actually improve with every oil-derrick we put up! We have big plans for that area."

When asked to discuss Blexxon's current reserve of heating oil Rich replied, "If you've got the cash we've got the oil," he added, "poor people will of course receive Federal and local assistance in the form of the coal-in-the-stocking plan. This will be sponsored by the breakwindfall tax package being worked out by those politicians we've bribed—er—elected!"

After the cocktail hours I had the opportunity to chat with I.M. Rich (known as "Filthy" to his closest friends).

"Mr. Rich," I began, "did you know that Flunky's report shows fish enjoy eating oil?" "Please call me Filthy," he said, "It's been such a pleasure meeting the press. By the way, What type of whiskey is that you're drinking? Ah. Waiter! Another CC for Mr. Klos. Now where were we? Oh yes, the fish eating oil. No, it's really the other way around. We went to a local supermarket and conducted tests using ordinary fish raised on oil as it was much easier to fry them. This is just one of the little ways we at Blexxon are trying to save energy. Did I mention that the executive Jacuzzi thermostat has been lowered? We all have to do our part in helping solve our dependancy on those sneaky Arab's oil."

Gene Klos is a Collegian commentator.

It's a quest for human rights

Jim Moran

Gays who marched in the nation's capital last month for acquisition of their civil rights did so in the great tradition of modern political protest that began with the freedom marches for black civil rights in Montgomery and Selma nearly twenty years ago.

Likewise, homosexuals share an affinity with the women's liberation movement of the 1970's. What differentiates their cause, however, from their historical predeccesors is a basic question of morality. Blacks and women at least have the consistence with a set of family and religious values in their quest for equality in the marketplace and public institutions. Gay people, although many may too hold these values, are perceived, by the nature of their lifestyles, as being in conflict with such morals. As a result, an aura of insecurity stifles a more massive effort.

This insecurity can be seen on two fronts—(1), within the practices of gay culture, and (2), as gay people relate to the predominantly heterosexual society. For instance, it is widely speculated that homosexuals "flaunt" their orientation. What is often overlooked, though, is that this charge comes from "straight" men and women who are allowed to show signs of affection towards their partners in public. Heterosexuals can walk down the street holding hands, can kiss at a party, can dance with one another without too much difficulty. If two people of the same sex tried to do these things, they would, except in certain "tolerant" environments like Provincetown and San Francisco, be subject to severe social scrutiny.

Another fear nurtured within the heterosexual psyche is the presumed negative effect gays could have upon students in teaching positions. The notion that one individual could "convert," could have that much impact upon a person's sexual orientation is absurd in itself, not to mention its lack of regard for human free will. As author Gore Vidal once said, "If teachers really possessed the potential to convert, then by virtue of that I should be a little old spinster, since that's all I ever had for teachers growing up."

One overwhelming quality of the Gay and Lesbian March was the diversity of the event. Such groups as Gay Psychologists, Gay Socialists, Dignity—a gay Catholic group, gay lawyers, the Gay Mormons and more all had representative contingents. There was even a union of lesbian circus performers—the Lesbian Clowns. Their motto, of course—"We may be lesbian clowns, but we're serious about our rights." Talk about the "age of specialization!"

Some members of the San Francisco delegation spoke to this reporter. They explained the political climate in that city in the wake of the assassination of City Supervisor Harvey Milk, and the subsequent "token" sentence given the killer—the vindictive, ex-City Supervisor and policeman Dan White. White was given a seven-year sentence for killing Milk and Mayor George Moscone. White killed the two political allies last summer, after Moscone refused to reappoint him to his city position. One San Franciscan explains: "Within one hour after Harvey was dead, the gay people in our city pulled together. Simply by phone calls and distributing handbills we were able to demonstrate that night. We held a candlelight vigil. It was really just to demonstrate the tremendous loss we felt." Another member told of the riots that occured a few months later: "When the verdict was announced, that's when we became angry. It started out as a demonstration of about 10,000 people. There was no violence. We marched down Castro Street peacefully. I guess the riots and looting started when some young rabblerousers, out for the sake of causing trouble, began to toss bricks and tip police cars over. Then came the tear gas and billyclubs. Later in the evening, some gay men were sitting in the Elephant Bar discussing the day's events when the cops came in and started beating them up." He continues: "Normally, it's pretty cool in San Francisco. Gays have a lot of political and economic clout because there's a lot of us in business, and we make up 20 percent of the population. But there's something very wrong with our justice system when a guy can get off the hook for murdering two people. His defense said he murdered because he was "hypertensive," too much sugar in his diet, that he ate too many Hostess Twinkies. Can you imagine that—a system of justice based on Hostess Twinkies?

The gay rights march in Washington was significant, not so much for what happened as that it happened. It is a real positive step when 100,000 persons can come out of their shells and organize something. This does not mean there aren't some problems with the gay rights movement. Gays must link up with other political activists. More gay men and women must come "out of their closets." Gays must disassociate themselves with the negative aspects of their past, like the gay discos owned by syndicates that are in business for the sole purpose of financial exploitation of homosexuals. Gays must stop frequenting gay bathhouses and relegating their existence to pieces of meat, interested only in sex. Gays must work within the system to change things, must gain the respect of others through work and not seek the patronization that came from other minority gains like Affirmative Action. Our problem is not using our sexuality to obtain equal employment. Our problem is keeping our jobs with "disapproving employers" when it is discovered that we are gay. And no one should have to hide an inherent quality of themself. Heterosexual men and women are free to flirt with each other, even at work. Gay people have problems being themselves, not only at work, but in their private lives.

Part of the "work within the system," to which I refer means gay rights legislation. In the 96th Congress, in a few weeks, this state's junior U.S. Senator, Paul Tsongas, will introduce legislation to prevent discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation in all forms of employment—both private and public. This is a most important development for the rights of homosexuals and in the history of civil rights. I urge all supportive persons to make their feelings known, via a letter to your Congressman, and by keeping up to date on the legislative processes of the bill, once it is filed.

As Harvey Milk once said, "Rights are not won on paper. They are achieved through those who make their voices heard."

Responses to Lewis and IMSA columns

To the Editor:

As a non-Jew and a member of the University community, I for one, wish to apologize to the Jewish people for the shameful display of anti-Semitism that dominated the Collegian's Editorial page on Hallowe'en day.

The Wahsington Star cartoon of Menachem Begin, complete with large stereotyped hooked nose, sets the tone for the anti-Semitic pieces signed by James Lewis and the Iranian Moslem Student Association. Am I looking at a page out of the German press of the 1930s? Will it be the Protocols of the Elders of Zion next week?

I truly hope that James Lewis will look more carefully at the past record of anti-Semitism and will decide soon to wash his hands of it. It is a virulent and explosive poison that has led to horrendous consequences, not only for the Jews, but for the rest of us.

The Iranian Moslem Students declare that they are totally non-racist and in fact claim to be champions of oppressed Blacks in South Africa and other places. Yet by distributing the sleazy Masters of the Media pamphlet they have associated themselves with the National Alliance, the white-supremacist hate-group which first published it in its paper called Attack. They also march in step with two other American propaganda sheets which have printed the identical trash. They are the THUNDERBOLT: The White Man's Viewpoint (National States Rights Party), AND THE CRUSADER: The Voice of the White Majority, which claims to be the "Official Publication of the Ku Klux Klan." Strange company indeed.

David S. Wyman
Professor of History

To the Editor:

After the long and unsuccessful battle for women's pages in the Collegian, I was suprised by the unheralded advent of a Jew Piliory Page on Halloween Day. The characters that crawled out of the woodwork to participate in this great endeavor engaged in the same level of merry-making as did the primitives who stoned the Hampden DC and injured a horse at Tillson farm.

In view of the confused and disconnected train of thought expressed in James Lewis' editorial, he might be more effective in expressing himself through pictures. In fact, he would probably be a lot more entertaining if given his own comic strip, whose main character would be a wicked little Hebe. A writer with such talent for the absurd should not be wasted in the long, gray columns.

Fake ID's scare packies

To the Editor:

About the writers to your column who complained that Russell's Liquor store employees called the police when they suggested that they were being offered fake ID's:

State law does not absolutely require that the police be called, but does make the store responsible for being certain that nobody under the legal age purchases beer, wines, or liquors. Selling to anyone underage can not only result in fines or suspension of operations, but can actually result in permanently closing the store. The owners could lose their life savings, as well as their jobs and means of earning a living.

Suppose your father and mother owned a liquor store, and you were working behind the counter. If a potential customer offered you an apparently phony ID, would you say "No, I won't sell to you, but come around later—maybe you can sucker my mother into selling to you," or would you call the police?

Shame on UMass

To the Editor:

We are a university, large in size, and diversified in personal beliefs and values. Many people come in and out of this campus, but I would like to refer to a recent one in particular.

About a week ago, there was a "christian evangelist" outside the Student Union, at times surrounded by many people. He was faced with insults, laughter, jeers, and much more.

Would this evangelist have been more popular with the crowd if instead of advocating a God who loved and created each of us with a free moral choice to live our lives as we choose (choosing either to live for Him or live for ourselves), he had encouraged a life-style filled with more drugs, alcohol, sex, and a doing of your own thing.

Complimenting 'toons

To the Editor:

I would like to stick up for the cartoonists of this paper who have recently been insulted by Kathleen Baum and Denise Catellier (10/30).

Regarding the comics as "humorless, rude, and...distasteful, if not sick," these self-righteous women also pointed out a lack of creativity in the cartoonists.

Rude, distasteful, and sick many are, and these qualities, correct me if I'm wrong, are quite appealing to the Collegian's readers.

Personally, I feel that Kathleen and Denise suffer from dementia, as their remark on creativity was completely unjustified. S. Lafler's and R. Ranney's cartoons have shown the most originality and imagination that I've seen in any newspaper.

Broadway 'Babes' rock-disco

By JULIE EAGLE
Collegian Staff

Humor is Ellis Weiner's craft.

Weiner, who wrote the script for an updated rock-disco version of "The Babes in Toyland," showing at the Fine Arts Center Concert Hall tomorrow and Wednesday at 8 p.m., says humor "is a psychological pleasure you don't just get walking around looking at people...It's a harmony between events and yourself, seeing people laugh about things you think are funny...It's a synthesis which is very pleasant."

In a recent telephone interview, the former National Lampoon magazine editor described his version of "The Babes in Toyland," as a "futuristic" musical comedy with "slyly contemporary humor—it doesn't mug you, but if you get it, you get it."

The play is updated from the turn-of-the-century original by Victor Hebert. The modernized plot involved adventures of The Babes—three unemployed but talented rock-disco performers—at Toyland, Inc., a run-down amusement park.

At Toyland, the singers confront a host of Mother Goose characters and a vernerable toymaker and are foced to combat a variety of evil forces, including Barneby, a villain obsessed with computerizing Toyland.

This obsession, Weiner said, "is a classic notion of advancements of technology run amuck."

Barneby's evil, contrasted against the gaiety of The Babes and the other Toyland characters, epitomizes the theme of this play, Weiner said. "The play is all about spirit. It's about the innocence in which people have fun, as oppossed to Barneby, who wants to computerize everything."

The play's humor, Weiner said, is "modern." Asked if the jokes are risque, Weiner exclaims, "God forbid! I wish and you wish, but not for six-year-olds." The production will appeal to all ages, he said.

Weiner, 29, began working on the script a year ago, after John Weidman, author of "Pacific Overtures" recommended to the producers of "The Babes in Toyland" that Weiner take the job, Weidman had been originally asked to write the script, but declined and instead referred Weiner to producers Fran and Barry Weissler.

NBC surprises all networks

by MIKE ALBERT
Collegian Staff

Before the current television season began, critics mocked third-place NBC, and its president Fred Silverman's scheduling plans. However, six weeks into the season, NBC has every right to be proud as a peacock.

Over the first four weeks of the season, which began Sept. 17, the NBC television network had shockingly been the overall leader in the prime-time race, ahead of ABC and CBS, which have been first and second respectively over the past three years. It was not until two weeks ago – the fifth week of the season – that ABC finally overtook NBC in the season's overall ratings. The ratings, which are measured weekly by various companies including the well-known A.C. Nielson Co., represent the percentage of television households reached by network in the average minute. NBC's first-week triumph marked the first time the network has led the weekly ratings since October, 1978 during the World Series. Contributing to the network's recent victory were two first-rate movies, Coming Home and The Outlaw Josey Wales. Along with two series, "CHiPs" and "Little House on the Prairie," these programs rated among the week's top ten.

The second week of the season went unconvincingly to ABC. However, NBC bounced right back by winning the third week. The victory was achieved with the help of Johnny Carson's "Seventeenth Anniversary Show" special and with the assistance of the major league playoffs.

At this point, NBC's strength was first taken seriously as it inspired serious schedule revisions by other networks. ABC decided to move "Fantasy Island" from Fridays to Saturdays, "Hart to Hart" from Saturdays to Tuesdays, and schedule a series of specials on Fridays. ABC took "The Lazarus Syndrome" off the air to redesign for future programming.

Over at CBS, where only Sunday and Monday nights are "looking good," plans were made to replace "Last Resort," "Struck By Lightening," "Working Stiffs" (starring John Belushi's brother, Jim), "Big Shamus, Little Shamus" and "The Bad News Bears."

Meanwhile, NBC sat pretty and savored its success. For NBC, the week ending October 14, the fourth week of the current season, was another encouragement. Although ABC won, the week represented another triumph for NBC, which finished second in the ratings.

SCERA holds library forum

The Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy will sponsor a forum Wednesday on the closing of the University Library at 4 p.m. in Bartlett Auditorium.

Joe Cohen, SCERA member and forum coordinator, said adminstrators as well as students have been encouraged to attend. The purpose of the gathering is to provide a forum for ideas on action to be taken. It will also allow SCERA members to inform students about the research they have done on the library.

Cohen said it was important for UMass students to understand what is happening to their library by questioning available administrators.

Hampden shows NY artist

Paintings and drawings by New York artist Sam Messer are on exhibit starting today in Hampden Gallery in Southwest. An opening reception for the exhibition will be held today from 4 to 8 p.m. The exhibition runs until Nov. 20. Gallery hours are Sunday, 2-5, and Monday-Friday, 4-8 p.m.

NFL Roundup

By BRUCE LOWITT
AP Sports Writer

Roger Staubach's touchdown pass to Drew Pearson with 2:24 to play and Rafael Septien's 22-yard field goal with 3 seconds left gave the Dallas Cowboys a 16-14 National Football League victory Sunday over the New York Giants.

New York, seeking its fifth consecutive victory, had built a 14-6 lead on a pair of touchdown passes by rookie quarterback Phil Simms. Simms passed 32 yards to Johnny Perkons in the second period and 23 yards to Billy Taylor in the fourth.

By raising their record to 8-2, the Cowboys opened a two-game lead over Washington and Philadelphia in the National Conference East. The Redskins lost 38-7 to Pittsburgh and the Eagles were beaten 24-19 by Cleveland.

Elsewhere, New England ripped Buffalo 26-6, Atlanta edged Tampa Bay 17-14, San Diego defeated Kansas City 20-14, Baltimore beat Cincinnati 38-28, St. Louis mauled Minnesota 37-7, Los Angeles silenced Seattle 24-0, Denver beat New Orleans 10-3, Oakland shelled San Francisco 23-10, Chicago clobbered Detroit 35-7 and the New York Jets outlasted Green Bay 27-22.

Septien also kicked field goals of 26 and 37 yards for Dallas. Staubach started the winning drive with 1:49 to go and the Cowboys on their 9-yard line. The key plays were passes covering 27 yards to Pearson and 32 yards to Tony Dorsett.

In Pittsburgh, Terry Bradshaw threw four touchdown passes, two to John Stallworth, to lead the Steelers past Washington. Bradshaw matched his four-touchdown passing performance in last January's Super Bowl against Dallas. He had never thrown for more than three touchdowns in a regular-season game.

Stallworth, who caught six passes for 126 yards, had an 11-yard scoring reception in the first period and a 65-yarder in the third quarter. Bradshaw also combined with Benny Cunnigham on a 16-yard screen pass and Randy Grossman an a 4-yarder for his other touchdowns. The Redskins' score was a 4-yard run by John Riggins.

Mike Pruitt sprinted 24 yards for a touchdown with 55 seconds to play, giving the Browns their victory over the Eagles, who got 197 yards rushing from Wilbert Montgomery. Cleveland started its comeback from a 19-10 deficit when Brian Sipe passed 5 yards to Ozzie Newsome. Philadelphia's Harold Carmichael set an NFL record by catching a pass for the 106th consecutive game.

Steve Grogan threw for 350 yards and three touchdowns and the Patriots sacked Buffalo quarterback Joe Frerguson seven times in New England's victory. Grogan's scoring passes covered 63 and 34 yards to Stanley Morgan and 6 yards to Horace Ivory. The Patriots lead Miami by one-half game in the American Conference East with the Dolphins hosting Houston Monday night.

Steve Bartkowski's 4-yard touchdown pass to Jim Mitchell early in the fourth quarter and Bubba Bean's 60-yard dash for a score with 1:22 to play gave the Falcons their triumph over Tampa Bay, 7-3.

Dan Fouts threw for 229 yards and one touchdown as San Diego downed the Chiefs. Fouts, however, failed in his bid for a fifth straight 300-yard passing game.

Bert Jones threw one touchdown pass, then suffered a sprained right shoulder, so Baltimore's Greg Landry threw two second-half scoring strikes and led the Colts past the Bengals. Ken Anderson and Isaac Curtis of Cincinnati teamed up on scoring pass plays of 67, 8 and 43 yards.

The New York Giants defense tries in vain to thwart a field goal by Dallas' Rafael Septien. The three-pointer gave the Cowboys a come from behind victory over the Giants, 16-14, at the Meadowlands. The kick came with only three seconds remaining. (AP Laserphoto)

Stickwomen battle Iowa to tie

By MIKE ESTRADA
Collegian Staff

It would be difficult to tell whether former UMass coach Judy Davidson was satisfied with her homecoming yesterday at NOPE; it was a mixture of frustration and luck. Her University of Iowa field hockey team was outplayed as much as any team can be without losing. In the end, the stickers' inability to capitalize and the superb goalkeeping of Iowa's Marcy Mills let the visitor escape to the flatlands with a 1-1 tie.

The contest turned out to be a warmup session for both squads heading for their respective regional tournaments in the next two weeks. But perhaps Pam Hixon, coach of the 13-2-1 Minutewomen, has a bit of mixed fellings herself; the knowledge that this year's squad can compete with the midwestern teams but as against Dartmouth, it has to be able to score to win. UMass had a barrage of 21 shots on the Iowa net. The break they needed came at 9:07 of the second half when Senior Laura O'Neil netted a penalty stroke to lend a fresher air to a generally frustrating afternoon for UMass.

"We had one of the best second halves we've had all year," said second year coach Hixon. Indeed, UMass penetration was not the problem. Wide shots and the talent of Marcy Mills (18 saves) kept UMass, in particular the sticks of Sue Caples, Patty Bossio and All-American Judy Strong, from scoring early on when there was time to come back and win.

Iowa boasted no balanced attack but scored at 6:50 of the first half when Kelly Flanagan blasted one home from the top of the circle.

The stickers, who have only had to come back several times this year and only twice failing, applied constant pressure to the Iowa defense that with the exception of O'Neil's thirteenth goal, came up empty.

No seedings for the Northeast Regional had been announced at press time, but is likely UMass will be seeded in the top three despite yesterday's tie. Iowa (10-4-1) heads to their own regional tournament next week against Minnesota and last year's finalist St. Louis. Should UMass and Iowa both survive the regionals, there is the possibility the two teams will meet again in Princeton, where the game will be more than a friendly homecoming.

Equestrian team wins at UNH

PATTY ZINKOWSKI
Special to the Collegian

Heavy rain did not dampen spirits as the UMass Equestrian team was declared High Point College at the U.N.H. intercollegiate horseshow on Saturday.

Competing against 19 other colleges, the UMass team placed consistently high to finish with a score of 30 points. Rob Gustafson, a point rider for UMass, rode to victory in both equitation on the flat and over fences. He received the Reserve High Point Rider award for his exceptional performance.

Co-captain Whitney Buttrick also proved her riding talent by finishing first over fences with a difficult horse and then going on to place second on the flat. Other individual awards went to Elise Weert, Jim Seligman, and Ray Whelihan for placing first in their respective classes.

Fine rides were turned in by co-captain Diane MacBeth, Rick McGrath, Marianne Mullin, Denise Brockelbank, Amy Shecter, Roberta Myrick and Maura O'Connel. Lisa DeSalvio made her team debut at the U.N.H. show.

Coach Sandy Most said she was very pleased with the caliber of riding the team demonstrated.

"We have a strong team with depth. U.N.H. was a job well done!"

Next week the equestrian team travels to New England College for its last show of the season.

Cooper scores lone goal

Booters blank Boston College

By DAVE BRADLEY
Collegian Staff

An unassissted Scott Cooper goal early in the second half and a determined defensive effort led by Bret Simon and Mike St. Martin lifted the men's soccer team to a 1-0 win Saturday over Boston College on a soggy Boyden field.

UMass controlled the action through most of the contest but had to stave off some late-game Eagle pressure before recording their sixth win. The Minutemen are now 6-4-2; BC, 6-6-4.

The goal, Cooper's second of the season, came with 2:24 gone in the second half. Simon started the play by sailing a corner kick from the left of goal into a pack of players in front of BC goalie Tom McElroy. Neither team could get clean control of the ball and it rolled straight out to Cooper, who promptly reversed its direction and sent a screamer to the upper left corner of the net.

Coac Russ Kidd was satisfied with the team's performance, especially the defensive effort of Saint Martin, Simon, Mark Vassalotti, and goalie Mark Marilla.

"I was very pleased with the hustle and the cool," Kidd said. "Saint Martin and Bret were just super. They don't get enough credit. All four of them (the defense) are going 90 minutes."

Tri-captain Saint Martin also commended Simon and the overall team effort.

"Bret Simon, he never gets any recognition and his is probably the hardest position (stopper-back)," Saint Martin said.

"Conditions were hard but we didn't do too bad," he continued. "We had some nice exchanges."

UMass, coming off a bruising 1-0 win over Westfield State College Wednesday, found themselves in another physical game Saturday in which action was stopped twice to attend to injured players on both sides. The Minutemen were forced to play without forward Chris New (sprained back, out for the season) and midfielder Doug White (sprained ankle, expected back for next game), both of whom were injured in the Westfield game.

"We were still lean after that Westfield game," Kidd said.

UMass had the edge in scoring opportunities in the first half and wasted little time putting the pressure to BC. Before five minutes had elapsed, tri-captain Mark Vasington had a hard shot from in close deflected just wide by a BC defender. Vasington, in a crowd about seven yards away from the goal, took a pass from Tony Dias in the corner to the goalie's left and let loose with a boomer that was redirected out of play.

Midway through the half Saint Martin came within about a yard of scoring when he booted a low shot from forty yards out to the goalies right. McElroy got two hands on the ball by diving to his left, but he was unable to hold on. The ball continued to roll toward the goal line but got stuck in the mud before crossing it. Had it been a dry day the shot might have been a goal.

UMass' Marilla had to contend with 12 shots on goal throughout the game while making five saves. UMass had nine shots forcing six saves.

Patriots trounce Bills; lead in AFC East

By MEL REISNER
AP Sports Writer

BUFFALO, N.Y. — Steve Grogan of the New England Patriots knows he's usually safe behind his massive offensive linemen, and the knowledge has helped him mature as a National Football League quarterback.

Grogan, throwing darts from behind the human fence of John Hannah & Co., riddled the Buffalo secondary for three touchdowns and 350 yards yesterday,outdueling the league's toprated passer in a 26-6 New England triumph over the Buffalo Bills.

Buffalo signal caller Joe Ferguson, who knows the value of protection, had none. He was sacked seven times, forced into throwing two interceptions and was knocked cold in the fourth quarter and left the game.

"When you get time to get set back there we've got the people who can get open," Grogan said. "The protection was great. I really didn't expect to have the kind of day we did the way their secondary has been playing. We got some big plays and that's what wins a game like this."

The fifth-year pro, throwing for more than 300 yards for the second straight contest and third time this year, hooked up with running back Horace Ivory for a 6-yard touchdown which tied the score 6-6 at halftime and later hit wide receiver Stanly Morgan with scoring strikes of 63 and 34 yards.

New England Coach Ron Erhardt said he thinks Grogan, known primarily for his running, has matured into one of the finest passers in the game.

"He's had a great year up to this point. He had a great afternoon throwing today," Erhardt said.

The decision put New England ¼ game ahead of Miami in the American Conference East and dropped the Bills to 4-6.

Ferguson suffered a slight concussion, said Coach Chuck Knox of Buffalo.

He said he expects the quarterback to play next week against the New York Jets and added that he was more concerned with Buffalo's failure to break open Sunday's game when it had the chance.

"We should have come out with at least 14 points early in the game," Knox said. "Everytime we'd get something going we'd get a flag or make a mistake. You just can't do that and win against a good team like that."

Cleveland Browns wide receiver Reggie Rucker heads for the goal line after catching a pass in yesterday's game versus the Philadelphia Eagles. In pursuit of Rucker is Eagles defensive back Randy Logan. (AP Laserphoto).

Buffalo's points came in the first quarter, when placekicker Nick Mike-Meyer connected for field goals of 39 and 40 yards. Mike-Meyer missed his next three attempts.

Kicker John Smith of the Patriots, who had one miss, gave New England its first lead of the afternoon when he socked a 33-yard three-pointer midway through the third quarter and applied the coup de grace with a 37-yard boot late in the contest.

In addition to sacking Ferguson for 65 yards in losses and putting the NFL's top-rated passer out of action with 10 minutes left in the game, New England got key interceptions from linebacker Rod Shoate and cornerback Raymond Clayborn to set up both third period scores.

The Patriots also recovered three Buffalo fumbles.

Ferguson, clicked on half of his 26 passes for 215 yards, nailed tight end Reuben Gant for 20 yards and wide reciever Frank Lewis 24 on the team's first possession.

However, when Ferguson found wide receiver Lou Piccone for 14 yards and a first down on the New England 1 yard line, the play was nullified by a pass interference penalty. Patriots' end Tony McGee threw Ferguson for a 7-yard loss on the next snap to force Buffalo to settle for a field goal.

McGee personally sacked the quarterback three times and shared in another in a virtuoso performance.

The Patriots were stymied by their own mistakes and the tenacious Buffalo defense until late in the second quarter, when Grogan passed 25 yards to Harold Jackson and 20 yards to Morgan to set up the first touchdown.

Smith, who had missed only one of 29 point-after attempts going into the game, kicked the ball low into a stack of players to cause the halftime tie. Earlier in the quarter, defensive end Sherman White of the Bills was credited with his fourth blocked field goal attempt this year.

New England linebacker Steve Nelson, the team's leading tackler twisted his right ankle while blocking on Shoate's interception return, but his loss for the rest of the game didn't seem to alter the effectiveness of the Patriots' defense. Shoate pilfered the ball on his own 46 yard line and lateraled to safety Rick Sanford for a 27 yard return.

An Interview With PEDRO SERVIAT RODRIGUEZ:

CUBAN REVOLUTIONARY

Last week Carl Yates, Tony Crayton and Bari Njiiri went to New York City to Interview Pedro

Below is an excerpt of that interview.

N N. What does it mean to be Black in Cuba?

P S In Cuba we have not defined Black as it was defined in the U.S. If one person had an ancestor-who was a slave he was considered Black. There was also the Mulatos who were considered something different. You had Blacks and Mulatos. As a rule if a Spaniard had a child by a slave woman, he would be a Mulato, who would be set free. A distinction was made between Blacks and Mulatos. Two distinct societies grew up one Black and one Mulato. However, these two societies were not as distinctly and strictly defined as in South Africa.

N N What are the benefits for Black Americans of the study of Cuba• Why should we study Cuba?

P S We have had a specific historic experience. This experience indicates that in Cuba the Blacks have realized that they alone could not solve their problems. Until independence in 1868, the Blacks started to struggle for their freedom. The whites were struggling on their own against colonialism. The whites wanted break away from the Spaniards as they did later in Zimbabwe. It was not until both Black and White united that they were both able to unite in their struggle, and to create a national consciousness. Slavery was abolished only after this unity was achieved.

The other important experience, which is more recent, is that Cuba is the only country in Latin America, that has done away with racial discrimination. In this country Black participation was denied for a long time. In Cuba Black and White participation in the struggle has existed for a long time. This concept was understood by Jose Marti, Antonio Maceda, Antonio Mella, Antonio Guitera and Fidel.

I think these are important aspects that Blacks here can learn from Cuba.

N N If it can be stated what are the feelings and the attitudes of the Cubans towards Black Americans?

P S We feel a deep solidarity to the struggles of Black Americans. We see their struggle as out struggle. This expression of solidarity has had historic roots. From the beginning of the twentieth century Cubans understood the struggles of the Black Americans. Jose Marti wrote a great deal of articles regarding the struggles of Black Americans. And many activities in solidarity with Black Americans have been held in our country. In the cases of Scotboro, Angela Davis and the Wilmington Ten, we have expressed solidarity with these people as well as all political prisoners in the United States. These feelings have been expressed by Fidel in many of his speeches.

In several univeristies we have studied the history and struggles of Black Americans. In general we considered them an oppressed group which needs the widest and greatest solidarity.

N N To what extent has Cuban society eliminated racism in society and its institutions?

P S If we understand racism as discrimination against the color of one's skin and the criteria of considering one race superior over another, this racism has been completely eliminated in Cuba. In the practice of everyday life and in the institutions laws exist to stop racial discrimination. The year before last our constitution was passed establishing equality for all. There is equal rights in jobs, housing, education and people have the right of an equal participation to all institutions and facilities. Besides racial discrimination is considered a crime.

After the triumph of the Revolution, we have never faced a case of racial discrimination in Cuba. This does not mean that you can find an isolated case of discrimination by members who live in the former society. You may find these people with some prejudice. For instance you can find parents who do not want their daughter to marry a black man, but the daughter marries him anyway and no one can prevent that. This problem is an internal one of that family.

In all spheres of life people are not only respected, but encouraged. Anyone who visits Cuba will see this. Racism although it existed in Cuba was never as strong as it exist in America.

N N Are Cuba and the Soviet Union allies or as the U S press would say puppet and puppetier?

P S All socialist countries are allies . They have the same ideology they struggle for the same goal-the liberation for humanity-from these points of views we they share the same problem.

However, the Soviet Union, has its own problems. Cuba has its own problems. Experience is showing that Cuba is no satellite. I will give an example of a recent incident that was in the press, that ie. the issue of Soviet troops in Cuba. This is evidence that Cuba is no satellite. Why do I say this? Against whom did the U.S. take against the "satellite no measures should be taken against the satellite. The next day after Carter finished making his speech, the United States sold the largest amount of wheat to the Soviet Union in history. This shows that measures were taken against Cuba. They knew that the troops were there long before this speech. They were just using this for electoral polics and to show that they were strong.

N N According to some segments of the U S press it was stated that Fidel was trying to muscle the non-alignec countries into the Soviet camps. What was your impression of the non-alligned conference?

P S That is completely false. This could be seen when Fidel made his speech at the conference. The speech was applauded by a overwhelming majority of the members at the conference. As we all know in the non-aligned nations we have different criteria differnt opinions. Had these people who were sitting there had they thought that they were trying to muscle as you say they would never had applauded his speech they would never had passed his speech because there are different points of view however all of them considered his speech to be objective. That was reality. How could you explain that situation. There was a free rostrum there. There everyone spoke there view. So these are just lies being said to attack the Cuban Revolution.

N N One more thing dealing with the press. It was recently reported that a large number of children from the Congo were sent to Cuba and that some of them were sent against their parents will. How true is this?

P S Cuba has made great headway in education

A great number of African countries take opportunities to utilize Cuba's educational system. We have very

ANTI-PEOPLE

The parents of 27-year old Susan Baum had emigrated to Israel from the United States in 1971, settling in Eilat while a married daughter went to live in Haifa. Susan, a young lady, with an inquiring mind, remained in the United States where for a brief period she became interested in the movement called "Jews For Jesus." In October 1974, she cabled her parents that she was coming for a three-week visit and it was arranged that her sister in Haifa would meet her at the airport. But when the EL AL flight landed, Susan was not to be found. Her sister and brother-in-law inquired of the airline officals, the airport and the immigration people, and had her paged repeatedly on the loudspeakers. They called the American Embassy which appeared helpless to aid them. When word of this reached her parents in Eilat they were understandably alarmed. Finally, they telephoned New York and confirmed that she had boarded the plane there. All through that day and next, the worried family sought word of their daughter, but the authorities could give no help and it appeared that she had simply vanished--until she telephoned them from New York and reported that she had in fact arrived in Israel on schedule. No sooner had she presented her passport than she was deported immediately as a missionary. Her requests that she be allowed to telephone her parents or see the relatives who had come to meet her were brusquely denied and she was held under guard and incommunicado all through the day and finally put on a plane for New York, being required to surrender her return flight ticket for that purpose. Through the newspapers, her outraged parents sent an "open letter" to Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin, saying: "If our daughter has no right, without a warning and with no trail, to visit her homeland, and to contact her parents, then 'good-bye, Mr. Rabin.' We go back to a free state, a state wherin a man has a right to advice and guidance, a place wherein a daughter is allowed to visit her parents."

The Interior ministry refused to divulge the grounds on which it had refused to grant her permission to visit her parents, and it scornfully rejected their request that they be reimbursed for the money paid out for air fares and telephone calls. It was obvious that Susan's announced that they were leaving Israel immediately to reestablish their residence in the United States. (The Jerusalem Post Weekly, 2-18-1975).

In an explosive articale in Yediot Ahronot, Knesset member Shulamit Aloni denounced the authorities for their treatment of Susan Baum, "If sensitivity to democracy, rule of law and human rights was existent in Israel, tens of thousands would have joined me in my claim. If the quality of our life and our national image concerned us and if the Government was truly interested in immigration and in bringing American youths near to us, beyond lip-service...it would have held a special meeting about this issue."

Noting that the Minister is entitled to deny entry to anyone who is "liable to hurt the public's feelings," Ms. Aloni concluded scornfully: "Anyone who ever said a good word for Jesus is prohibited from coming to Israel. The Minister, in his sole discretion, without trial, with no charge, without explanation, can deport a man from his country because he thinks that the man might hurt the public's feelings. Which public? Which feelings? On what is such arbitary authority based, except on the laws of Sodom and Gomorrah?" (Yediot Ahronot February 2, 1975).

Dr. Israel Shahak, chairman of the Israeli League for Human and Civil Rights, noted that the precipitate deportation of Susan Baum was evidence that the State fo Israel maintained, through Zionist organizations abroad, a system of spying and surveillance of Jews in America which represented a corruption of traditional principles involving the inviolacy of human and civil rights. That Miss Baum's brief brush with Christianity via the "Jews For Jesus" had been carefully card-indexed and reported to the Israeli authorities outraged the American tradition of freedom of religion, he maintained. (Letter to the author, 4-2-75).

Taleb Bizri,

ON SEPARATISM

What is a separatist? Is the separatist a non-white American who feels that whites and blacks should live in separate societies; go to separate school, eat in separate restuarants, use separate toilets, use separate blood, have sex with separate men and women and live in separate neighborhoods?

Is it possible for a non-white (ie. Black, Hispanic, Native American or Asian) to become part of the society and still retain his or her identity as an African, Native American or Asian?

American society has not told the truth concerning the attribution of modern inventions and the evolution of the sciences and the arts. American history begins with Europe, and Ancient history in America begins with Greece. Sometimes there are references to China in Asia.

The educational program in the United States served to perpetuate the myth that African Americans are inferior intellectually and culturally. This reinforced the racism that claimed the lives of millions of African Americans.

It would be wrong to allow this present system to exist. It must change, all the lies must be exposed and the truth must be spelled out.

Now that the truths of world history and evolution are being documented, it is interesting to note the different approach to race America is assuming. Now they are saying beings came from outer space and created such advanced civilization. Others are becoming less prejudice.

It is good that people are becoming humanitarian and more educated, and it is encouraging to see White Americans with conscience. But the recourse should not be to make Black Americans on T.V. more, in token positions.

Can we be brethen with us having our Africans identity? Are we separatist for giving you the truth about the orgins of modern civilization? Are you willing to change your education program to state the truth of history?

Black Americans finally becoming Americans?

The inequalities and evils of the society persist.

America cannot convince us of its sincerity unless we see fundamental changes in society. Seeing some black American living well does not satisfy us. Being Black in skin color only does not satisfy us. What does satisfy us is knowing our history, the Whites and especially the Blacks, of Africa.

We are not separatist. We should be but generally and at this point in time we are not. But, if out White friends cannot become part of the change of society, and cannot remain freinds because of our knowledge of our history; if we cannot get jobs, proper education, proper housing and etc. while still maintaining some understanding of our identity as African American, then our friends are being separatist. Our friends cannot be our friends unless we respect their integrity as human beings, and we require the same.

THE BLAMELESS ETHIOPIANS

by Tony Crayton

Ancient Civilization in Africa is rarely thought of outside of Egypt and in fact, it is construed that the rest of Africa is the home of barbarism" (Mac Gaffey, Concept of Race in Northeast Africa; VII, I, 1966, 1-17). The negative views of Africans outside of Egypt is predicated not on a lack of evidence of a high culture but on purely racist notions of culturally inferior inhabitants of a "dark continent."

The views of the Ancient writers and the evidence from Archaeological studies clearly show that the racist descriptions of barbarians is no where near the truth. The Civilization that travellers and traders found past the boards of Egypt; the Land of Kush, was considered the land where civilization truely began.

Kush, Nubia, Ta Seti are all of the various names attributed to the Land of Gold. Stretching up the Nile to the Ethiopian highlands from the first Cataract (area of rapids), the Nubian Civilization sprung into a centralized kingdom as early as 3300 B.C.

The Nubians during this time are referred to as the A-Group and their cities and settlements south of the first cataract in Ethiopia, were indicating a fairly wealthy population. Linen cloths, copper tools (axes, adzes, chisels), stones palette, bowls and pendants all were indicative of a well to do people. Their wealth may have been due to their middleman position between the gold producing regions (Dongola) the ivory, incense ostritch feathers and ebony products or Punt (Somalia) and those from the north in TaMerry (Egypt) who brought for exchange products of their industry and those of the Near East.

The "gifts" found in Cemetery 137 in Lower Nubia seem also to suggest that it is possible that they represent "gifts to a Nubian Leader for the role that he and his men had played in the war that had united Egypt" (Trigger 1976). They also may represent tribute from the beleagured Upper Egyptian King in exchange for raw material and allied troop - support against Lower Egypt.

Nubia during this early period (3300-3000BC) clearly held a powerful position over the southern region's trade. They also had a central state organizaed to protect it.

The images and artifacts left to us today on the Nubian people are rarely pictured for us to truely appreicate. Their art and the culture was as rich and distinct as that of her northern neighbor Egypt.

They left for us to marvel Ram's Head Amulets of bichrome banded Egyptian jasper. The Ram was the physical representation of Amun chief god whose true being is "hidden." Their shield-rings were elaborately styled "collars" attached to rings by hindges decorated with fused-glass inlays on gold with ram headed crowns, chaples and other beautifully executed styles. They were greatly known for their methods of opening. Yet more striking and enchanting is the Hathor Head Rock Crystal ball; the gold head surrounding a crystal ball. This intense beauty cannot be matched or parralled by any similar Egyptain artifact.

A people to me, however, should be less praised for their technology and art; complete praise should be reserved for the one aspect people no longer seem to respect - Morals and Ethnics.

Several verses in the Pyramid Text (Faulkner, 1969, pg 144) refer to Nubia in a way that no nation was ever so honored. These Egyptian writing say "The savour of Ddwn (a Nubian God), the Youth of Upper Egypt who issued from Nubia, is on you; may he give you the incense wherewith the gods are Femigrated." When I read this I felt a strange sense that they meant that the Gods of Egypt who were adopted by the Greeks and the Romans had a special relation with Nubia. Since most current scholarship on the subject of African contributions to Civilization are so racist and distored, it was only intellegent not to look immediately to them. However, the truth is the truth.

Both Herodotus and Diodorus gave similiar accounts of the Ethiopian King Sabaco who is said by both to have abolished the death penalty and instead required labor on Public works.

During the Persian attacks of Ethiopia the King criticized the Persians for not being just "for no just man would covet a land not his own" (Snowden, 1970, pg. 145). He then destroyed the Persians and they were forced to go back for loss of supplies and vast numbers due to canabalism. The most beautiful attribute said of the Ethiopians was by Diodorus he says that: "They (Ethiopians) were the first to be taught to honor the gods and to hold sacrifices and festivals and procession...and that in consequence their piety has been published abroad among all men, and it is generally held that the sacrifices practiced among the Ethiopians are those which are the most pleasing to heaven."

Stobaeus said of them: "The Ethiopians practice piety and justice; their houses are without doors and no one steals the many things left in the streets.

The grammarian; Placidus said; "for the Ethiopians are said to be the justest men and for that reason the gods leave their abode frequently to visit them."

Here we have a great African Civilization outside and distict from Egypt that was the first to abolish the death penalty, enjoyed total security at home and in the street and were world - renouned for being the most just and pious. Why after this many years of primary, secondary and post-secondary education, most have never even heard that•

Education should uphold the truth yet it surpresses it in a Europhilic orgy that fails to give credit to those who taught them the very paths to western civilization. The Dawn of Civilization was ours and as the slave trade set at dusk it was Africa who civiliized the world and European who destroyed it.

HE'S A ZIONIST!

Foad Vafaei

These days the Zionist gangs of UMass have heated up their notorious racist right-wing propaganda. They're using an anti-Semitic leaflet. But despite the fact that there is an anti-Jewish leaflet which is anti-Zionist by coincidence, it does not follow at all that all the anti-Zionist and progressive forces are against Jews.

In the leaflet all Jews are blamed for the crimes of the Zionist regime of Israel against Arabs. That is like blaming all Germans for the crimes of Nazis against Jews. The overwhelming majority of Jews in the U.S. have no common interest with Zionist capitalist and their imperialist supporters. It is the task of all freedom fighters to oppose anti-Semitism in the Western societies.

These days you can see the shameful articles, and full of falsifications, by the "commentator" Santis. this is no flattery to have an opponent such as Mr. Santis, so ignorant about historical facts. Santis never understands what he is talking about. He denies rationality. He is full of delirious racist feelings. The reason for that is very simple: He is a Zionist! But more than that, he is anti-Sematic, since he blames all the Jews to have his illness.

Zionism has always been blind to the national existence of the Palestinian Arabs and subject to the "moral schizophrenia" involved in setting up an exclusionary, semitheocratic and racist Jewish society in Palestine, while everywhere else Jewish survival is linked to the maintenance of pluralistic societies.

The hypocrisy of screaming against Palestinian "terrorists" (who have killed less than 100 Israelis in the 15-year history of their organizations) is clear when one knows the historical facts. Begin was a leader of the terrorist organization Irgun which massacred and dismembered 253 men, women, and children of the Arab village of Dier Yassin in 1948. Begin himself says in his book The Revolt that after the massacre of Deir Yassin, the "liberation" of Teberias and Haifa was "as easy as a knife cutting through butter." That massacre was one of a series of terrorist actions which forced the Christian and Muslim Palestinians to flee their homelands. To this day, the huge Israeli military machine is carrying out daily bombings and massacres of hundreds of defenseless Palestinians and Lebanese in southern Lebanon. Using the excuse of "fighting against terrorism," policies of regular bombings, terrorism against thousands of civilians, and colonizing and occupying more and more of Europe, they also who used notorious excuses such as "vital space for the German race" or "saving the Third Reich."

Israel is a settler colonial state not much different from its twin, South Africa. Both the Zionist and apartheid systems were established on an ethnocentric and racially exclusive ideology marked by the same attitude toward people of underdeveloped lands. Those Palestinians who were not driven out of Palestine are now treated as second-class citizens. Fifty percent of the workers in manufacturing in Israel are Palestinians. And there is also racism toward oriental Jews in every sphere of social life. Sixty five percent of the population of Israel consists of Oriental (Sephardic) Jews. But they have just three percent of all top executive government posts and less than twenty percent of the seats of the Parliament.

The same racist attitudes which enabled the grand bourgeoisies of the European powers to establish colonies around the world created the discrimination against Palestinians. The ground for the Zionist movement was set gradually among European Jews in the late 19th and early 20th centuries in part as a response to the notorious anti-jewish anti-Sematic campaigns in Europe. However, Zionist ideology compliments rather than challenges the myths spread by anti-Semitism because Zionism accepts the fundamental tenet of the Jew as forever alien to gentile societies.

European anti-Sematism pressured and attempted to drive out of business the Jewish sections of the bourgeoisie who then needed a new social basis, a national territory and a people to exploit: the Jewish and Arab working classes would become that new base. From a movement which had won support due to anti-Jewish anti-Semtism with the merciless subjugation of the Palestinian people.

Western European and U.S. imperialism considered the Zionist demand for a Jewish state a convenient opportunity to consolidate and strengthen their own influence in the Middle East. It also gave the excuse the British needed to crush the Arab movements for national independence at which the Palestinian people were in the forefront.

The Israeli state has been instrumental in maintaining a wretched status quo in many Arab countries by providing a support for reactionary Arab ruling classes who exploit and repress their own peoples. In the words of the late Golda Meir, former Israeli Prime Minister,

"Israel is really a safeguard for the maintenance of American interests in the area, of the first line of defense for American interests in the Mediterranean basin. We are also the main safeguard for the protection of the Islamic regimes that are loyal to them (the U.S.) in the area."

--Ha'aretz, March 7, 1973
(an Isaeli daily newspaper)

But let us see what are the interests of the United States in the area. Israel, by following the delirious dreams of Zionist leaders for a "great" and "holy" land for Israel, from Iraq to Egypt, has carried out policies of aggression against its Arab neighbors which resulted in four bloody wars in the Middle East. Primarily that would help the arsenal industry of the U.S. to have a good market for its weapons. Besides that, the agressions of Israel toward the Arab countries would help the reactionary Arab regimes to survive against the will of the Arab masses. And that would create a great market and also important places for investments for Western corporations.

Because of the very nature of the state of Israel any revolutionary movement in the area (or to a larger extent, around the world) would be opposed by the Isaeli state. That's why the reactionary regime such as South Africa, Somoza, the Shah of Iran, South Vietnam, etc. were and are being helped by 'israel. That also explains why Israel attacked Nasser in 1956 along with Britain and France, just at the time that Nasser nationalized the Suez Canal and threatened the economic interests of the British imperilaists.

The masses of Jews in Israel are being abused so the Western imperialists headed by the U.S.-based multinational corporations can make more profits.

Around two million Palestinians expelled from their homeland by the Zionist regime are not allowed to go back to their homeland. A large portion of them live in miserable refugee camps. The Palestinians who stayed make up the cheap labor for Zionist capitalists.

The Palestinians people's liberation movement, led by the PLO, is directed against the whole structure of provilege and exploitation including Zionism, the Arab ruling classes such as dictators like King Hussein, Sadat or the Saudi monarchy, as well as against imperilaism which arms and maintains these regimes. The Palestinian demand for a democratic, secular Palestine puts forward the concept of a society which would have plenty of room for a progressive Jewish community enjoying full democratic rights in language, religion, culture, etc and living peace with all who live in the area.

But the U.S. capitalist class and the Zionists oppose this ideas as being directed against U.S. interests. That's the same old story. We should never forget that 50,000 American youth had to be destroyed so that "U.S. interests" could be saved against the will of the Vietnamese people.

The legally elected government of Salvador Allende in Chile had to be overthrown by the CIA, in order to save "U.S. interests." The fascist Shah had to keep his repressive state apparatus for 25 years, so the "U.S. interests" could be saved even if it was against the Iranian people's will. The people of Nicaragua had to suffer for years under the Somozas, so that "U.S. interests" could be saved. Blacks in South Africa have to suffer under the white-supremacist regime because it's in the best interests of U.S. corporations and banks.

However, people like Mr. Santis are free to scream as long as they like. Despite the power of the imperilaists, these Huns of our century, the future of the future of the world will be shaped by the struggle of the oppressed people of the world.

editorial THE SALT AND PEPPER AGREEMENT

The recent takeover of Student Senate Newspaper office by the Massachusetts Daily Collegian Saturday, November 2, against Nummo News constituted an illegal, unconstitutional act of piracy.

Nummo News is entrusted by the Undergraduate Students as a newspaper with publishing rights. The Collegian demanded that an agreement between both parties be reached by Saturday November 3, 9:00am.

Unfortunately the Collegian proposal for an agreement, which were hard line, would undermine the rights of Nummo News as a publishing entity as entrusted by the Student Senate. The Collegian proposals, as trivial as they were, would include Collegian personal involvement in Nummo News' choice of employees. Nummo News can and will not ever agree to Collegian control of Nummo News in any type or form and the resulting was their influence and contact to close down the newspaper office; which is owned by the Undergraduate Student Senate. The power of the Collegian lay in its assumed but incorrect rights to the newspaper facilities. This is only due to the preponderence of power and thinking of the campus body, but in stands unconstitutional and illegal. Nummo News is an entrusted RSO newspaper, ie. publishing entity with right to publish.

Furthermore the Collegian wanted to establish a spy system to ensure that every three hours on Saturday and Sunday, someone would come in and make sure that the Nummo News staff would not be using the edit writer 7200. This idea is not only ludicrous, but breeds viscious mistrust among the two groups.

What will nappen next are the suit to be brought by Nummo News against the Massachusetts Daily Collegian for illegal piracy of Senate equipment and facilities and the obstruction of the production of Nummo News. When the suits are heard through the Senate judiciary, a proposal will be drafted and submitted to the Student Senate, to be incorporated and amended by the Senate. The laws will be presented to the Board of Governors of the Campus Center defining the relationship between Nummo News and the Newspaper office.

In the November 2, 1979 issue of the Collegian there was a story titled 'Senate Car in addident.' This story was misleading in many respects.

Firstly, is says that representatives from Nummo News left the scene of the accident. This is not the case. The drivers of the pick up truck was given all the relevant information. This was the only way he could contact the necessary authories at UMass. The driver had no jurisdiction to keep anyone there after that point.

Secondly, the story stated that the car was not carrying registration papers of the LTD the registration papers were attached to the steering column. The driver of the pickup truck was given the registration papers, but could not varify the accuracy of them since he had never seen Massachusetts registration papers before.

The only unmisleading information was that the accident was a minor one, and that the LDT was being driven by representatives.

The Collegian should first obtain the facts before the story went to press. We want to set the record straight and futher reiterate the need for two newspapers which allows us to set the record straight for the community.

Nummo news is editorially independent of the Massachusetts Daily Collegian. It exists due to the prior struggles of Black students to obtain consistent coverage of Third World News.

FOUR SHOT TO DEATH AT ANTI-KLAN MARCH

By TOM STITES

Two carloads of whites opened fire yesterday on demonstrators preparing for a march in opposition to the Ku Klux Klan in Greensboro, N.C., killing four persons and wounding eight. Twelve men the police identified as associated with the Klan were taken into custody.

"As the marchers were getting ready to move out, two vehicles pulled up, a van and a sedan, and about a dozen men jumped out and commenced firing automatic weapons and shotguns," said Charles Travis of WGHP-TV in nearby High Point, who was reporting on the march.

The assailants jumped back into their vehicles and tried to speed away, Captain Hilliard said, but officers stopped both vehicles near the scene and arrested the occupants. He said that the van was loaded with weapons.

The demonstration, advertised in flyers as a "Death to the Klan" march, was sponsored by the Workers Viewpoint Organization, a leftist political group that has been active in the state for a decade. Captain Hilliard said the group had obtained a parade permit.

David Dalton, a television cameraman, who suffered pellet wounds in the leg, said after treatment that no police officers were present when the shooting began as the marchers massed near the Morningside housing project in a predominantly black neighborhood. Captain Hilliard said officers were nearby and that they were on hand because "we always provide police protection for any parade."

The Debut Of A New Group Of Messengers

On Tuesday, October 30th a newly-formed group of local musicians performed at the Black Cultural Center at Mount Holyoke College. The New Earth Ensemble and New Earth Poet gave an inspiring performance of Black Classical Music and Poetry. The group consisted of Pavelle Shepp playing drums, Mark Hickson on bass, Rick Scott Gordon (Ujamaa) on flute and soprano saxophone, Tony Parham on tenor and soprano saxes, Marvin Jones on bass clarinet, and Shareef Rasool playing congas and reciting most of the poetry which were his own compositions.

The group displayed their versatility extremely well. Ujamaa sang and recited some original poetry, everyone played various percussion instruments, and the first segment of the program featured original compositions by the group. The highlight of this segment was a song entitled "Talk About Justice" dedicated to the memory of Seta Rampersad and the implications of the situation surrounding her death. The event was much enjoyed by the audience which, though small was quite receptive and deeply effected. At least I know I was, and my conversations with those in attendance lead me to that conclusion.

I would encourage everyone to check out the New Earth Ensemble-Poets whenever and wherever they appear next. They certainly promote the notion that "There is a message in the music."

PRISMS

A Play Review

by Sartreina Cooper

'The time is the present. The setting is any prison', was the theme of 'Prisms' Friday night presented to over two hundred students in the Hampden Theater in Southwest.

'Prisms' is a play written by Mascheri Chapple, a Smith College Theater major. It is designed to show the political unjustices that occur in the prison systems, according to Mascheri Chapple.

'Anyone can write about political injustices in prison, said Mascheci,' but this view is shown through the eyes of a Black woman.

'Prisms' is Mascheri's second production. Her first play, 'Don't Cry Cuz The Sun Won't Shine,' won the Dennis Johnston Playwriting Award for the best script.

The play began when to the audience's surprise, two prison guards rudely ushered them to their seats.

The setting was a prison cell and the actors going by the names of Bobby, Booker, and Whitey used their excellent talent to show a very receptive audience exactly what goes on in prison

There were scenes that made the audience laugh and some that made them cry. There were times when even a tear could be seen in the eyes of Mascheri Chapple.

The cast consisted of Eric Moreland(Booker), Norman J. Lewis (Bobby), Waliyyudin Shariff (Tyrone or Whitey), David Donabedian (Guard 1) Kevin Ball (Guard 2), and Segun Eubanks as Guard 3 and a Dying Man.

Mascheri Chapple also shows how society can pressure Blacks into committing bazarre crimes through her three main actors, Bobby, a psychopath who killed his mother, Booker who killed an innocent little girl, and Whitey who killed a young boy.

Through 'Prisms', Mascheri Chapple has shown that society is a definite contribution to crime and that political injustice does exist in the prison system.

COUP IN BOLIVIA

Colonel Sized Control

Congress Defies Military, Backing Ousted Leader

LA PAZ, Bolivia, Nov. 1 — Troops led by an army colonel seized control of the Presidential Palace and other public buildings early today in an uprising against Bolivia's first civilian Government in more than a decade. The government had been in office since August.

Reiel soldiers guarding the palace opened fire later in the day, killing six people and wounding several, as crowds of protesters threw rocks at them.

The leader of the uprising, 52-year-old Col. Alberto Natusch Busch, proclaimed himself President. He said in a radio broadcast that he had moved to oust the elected President, Walter Guevara Arze, to preserve democracy and "put an end to the growing anarchy in the country."

But the extent of the colonel's control was not clear.

[The United States, which had backed the Guevara Government, expressed deep concern over the uprising and said the maintenance of democratic rule in Bolivia was of "great importance." The State Department warned that if the rebels succeed in consolidating power they could harm relations between the United States and Bolivia.]

As one indication that the rebels were not fully in control, Mr. Guevara was able to hold a furtive news conference during the day and vow to resist the uprising. Meeting with reporters in a house that was still under construction, he said it was possible that the armed forces would accept the colonel's move to avoid fighting among themselves.

"But this does not mean that all the armed forces are backing it," he added.

In addition, the Bolivian labor movement called a general strike to oppose the colonel, and it urged workers to defend democracy.

Two small political groups gave their support to the colonel, but one main Bolivian party, the Nationalist Revolutionary Movement of former President Victor Paz Estenssoro, announced its opposition.

The most recent military ruler, Gen. David Padilla, the armed forces commander, who turned over power to Mr. Guevara in August, denounced the colonel's uprising as senseless, called the rebels traitors and warned that they would have to face the serious consequences of their action.

Colonel Natusch countered by announcing the dismissal of General Padilla as armed forces commander, and the army high command said later that all military units had declared themselves in favor of the uprising and that the situation in the interior of the country was normal.

Today's rebellion apparently did not come as much of a surprise. Rumors that a coup was in the making began circulating soon after Parliament chose Mr. Guevara interim President on Aug. 7 to end an electoral stalemate.

Apparently because of them, Secretary of State Cyrus R. Vance took the unusual step last week while in La Paz for the annual meeting of foreign ministers of the member countries of the Organization of American States of giving a luncheon for Bolivia's political and military leaders and expressing United States opposition to any coup.

Colonel Natusch, long noted for his political ambitions, was reportedly among the senior officers invited, but he did not attend. Two former civilian Presidents, Mr. Paz Estenssoro and Hernán Siles Zuazo, did attend, as did the commanders of the army, navy and air force and leaders of parties represented in the Congress that was elected in July for the first time in 12 years.

The main subject at the luncheon reportedly was how to reduce military unrest over the weakness of the Guevara Government. Mr. Vance was said to have promised United States backing for moves to form a coalition government capable of taking effective action toward reducing inflation and foreign debt.

Colonel Natusch began his uprising early today only hours after delegates to the General Assembly of the O.A.S. had held their closing ceremonies here last night.

Sections of the armed forces were known to be angry with civilian rule because Parliament opened an inquiry into corruption under a former military ruler, Gen. Hugo Banzer Suárez. Colonel Natusch was a Minister of Agriculture during General Banzer's presidency.

The general seized power in 1971 and ruled for seven years.

General Strike Called

LA PAZ, Bolivia, Nov. 2 — Bolivia's cities were paralyzed today by a general strike called to protest the military takeover of the country yesterday, and the new rulers declared a state of siege.

Further defiance of the military came from the Congress, which was elected by Bolivians last July. It met and voted to support the ousted civilian President, Walter Guevara Arze, who had gone into hiding with most of his Government.

Denouncing the military takeover as a "major step backwards," the United States announced a suspension of its $21.5 million in aid and $6 million in military credits to Bolivia. Page 3.

But Col. Alberto Natusch Busch, who led the uprising yesterday and proclaimed himself President, struck back by announcing the dissolution of Congress. Bolivian politicians, however, defied him anew by calling a session of Congress for tomorrow morning.

Cabinet Is Formed

The 52-year-old colonel also announced the formation of a Cabinet of the "nationalist left" consisting of five officers and eight civilians, with three posts vacant. Gen. Julio Herrera, who was Defense Minister in the Guevara Government, was appointed Industry and Commerce Minister.

With the new Government facing opposition from most political parties, Colonel Natusch said he would rule without them. His Government said in a statement that it had intended to keep Congress open but had been forced to close it because of "repeated calls to subversion from several political factions."

Mr. Guevera, meanwhile, announced from his refuge that his Government would continue to function underground and would seek support to return to power.

Union leaders today extended for another 24 hours the general strike, which is affecting the tin mines, the backbone of the Bolivian economy, and there was speculation that the stoppages might continue into next week. The police were out in force in the cities to keep order.

Colonel Natusch, who apparently has the support of the three armed services, pledged that his Government would improve the country's administrative structure, guarantee individual liberty and human rights and cooperate with labor. He said, however, that the state of siege, involving a suspension of civil liberties, was necessary at present to protect national security.

Reports from around the country said that most stores and businesses were closed in Bolivian cities in response to the general strike called by the labor confederation. The military rulers were denounced by trade union chiefs as anti-democratic, and one leader of the mine workers warned that Colonel Natusch would strike at them next.

[While the colonel appeared to be supported by most military units, some military sources said, according to The Associated Press, that plans were being made to remove him.]

The colonel had planned to name his Cabinet last night but apparently ran into difficulties and postponed his announcement until today. Among his civilian appointees were Guillermo Bedregal as Foreign Minister and Agapito Monzon as Minister of Finance.

The Natusch Cabinet announced that it would hold municipal elections Jan. 15, but it did not mention elections due to be held next year to choose a new President.

Mr. Guevara, the head of Bolivia's first civilian Government in more than a decade, was elected interim President by Congress in August with the task of calling new elections in 1980. With no presidential candidate winnning the required majority last summer, the choice of a President automatically went to Congress. But a deadlock developed, and Mr. Guevara was a compromise choice for a year.

Bolivia's last constitutional President was Luis Adolfo Siles Salinas, who was ousted in September 1969.

Military Intervention: Old Story in Bolivia

By JUAN de ONIS

News Analysis

SANTIAGO, Chile, Nov. 2 — The Bolivian armed forces have produced more instability than order and progress in their backward country through chronic intervention in national politics.

The military takeover yesterday, the third in 14 months, overthrew an elected civilian Government for what appeared to be little more than the personal ambition of an officer egged on by some politicians who are out of power.

Alberto Natusch Busch, the 52-year-old colonel who led the uprising against President Walter Guevara Arze, has installed himself in the Presidential Palace with the apparent backing of the armed forces, but other officers are already said to be plotting to replace him.

In this game of military factions and personal intrigue, political ideology is rudimentary. Virtually all Bolivian officers call themselves "nationalists" and "revolutionary," but in practice this has not kept the military from violent repression of workers and students or from acting like a privileged caste when in power.

The country's 5.2 million people, half of whom are Indian peasants, are accustomed to political turbulence. In the 19th century, when local chieftains ruled like feudal lords, central government was weak and civil disorders frequent. Palace coups and civil wars made changes of governments and constitutions a violent process.

Bolivians have lost every foreign war in which they engaged. They have never recovered from the national trauma caused by losing to Chile all the provinces that gave Bolivia a Pacific coastline until the War of the Pacific in 1879-84. In another conflict with Brazilian irregulars, who came looking for rubber trees, Bolivia lost Acre Territory. Finally, in the Chaco War of the 1930's, in which 50,000 Bolivians died, Bolivia was defeated by Paraguay.

Civil Insurrection in 1952

None of these losses were as serious a blow to the Bolivian armed forces, however, as the revolution of 1952, when a civil insurrection led by the Nationalist Revolutionary Movement, a middle-class party seeking to break the power of large tin-mine owners and the rural landlords, defeated the army and purged many old-guard officers.

The Nationalist Revolutionary Movement Governments that ruled Bolivia from 1952 to 1964, in addition to making sweeping changes in the land laws and nationalizing the tin mines that provided 70 percent of Bolivia's export income, tried to identify the young army officers and cadets with "popular" programs like building schools, roads and clinics.

This brought the military more directly into touch with social realities in a country that is among the poorest in Latin America. One effect was to raise the political consciousness of the younger officers.

In 1964, President Victor Paz Estenssoro, running for his third term, chose as his running mate a dynamic and popular air force general, René Barrientos Ortuño, who spoke both of Bolivia's Indian tongues as well as Spanish.

Sabotage Suspected in Crash

The two were elected, but within a few months General Barrientos led a military uprising that overthrew Mr. Paz. In 1968 General Barrientos had himself elected to a new four-year term as President, but this period of relative stability was cut short when he died in 1969 in a suspicious helicopter crash.

Two years of military conflict followed, with wild swings in government policy. The left-wing Nationalists, during a brief stay in power, nationalized the remaining foreign-owned oil and mining companies, crippling further development. A rightist military reaction in 1970 brought to power Col. Hugo Banzer Suárez.

President Banzer ruled for seven years and began to lose control as corruption and conflicts over promotion divided the entrenched senior officers and ambitious colonels.

Pressure to Hold Elections

During the final two years of the Banzer regime, few important public contracts were awarded without bribing a military officer in an influential post. In some cases, the sums that have been reliably reported to have been paid exceed $1 million. Contraband on a huge scale and cocaine traffic have also been sources of payments for military "protection."

Internal resistance to the repressive methods of General Banzer, combined with pressure for democratic government in Latin America by the Carter Administration, led to movement in the military to force General Banzer to hold elections. An election in 1978, with an officially sponsored candidate, was a fiasco, with fraud so crudely evident that the vote had to be canceled.

A military coup to install the official candidate was followed two months later by a coup led by "democratic" colonels. General Banzer's power in the army was broken, and voting was held in July for the first elected Congress in 12 years. Congress named Mr. Guevara President.

This was the turbulent situation in which Colonel Natusch attempted to assume the role of strongman, in the tradition of General Barrientos and General Banzer. But he lacks the political support and personal charisma that General Barrientos had, or the strong military backing that General Banzer maintained for most of his tenure.

The opposition of the United States and Latin American democracies, particularly Venezuela, to the takeover is a problem that neither General Barrientos nor General Banzer faced. On the other hand, a right-wing military regime in Bolivia can expect to receive support from Argentina, Paraguay and Uruguay.

EL SALVADOR: IN THE BRINK OF CIVIL WAR.

On Oct. 22, San Salvador police opened machine gun fire on a march of several thousand people, killing 20. The demonstration was called by a coalition including the two largest mass revolutionary organizations—the Popular Revolutionary Bloc (BPR), and the United Popular Action Front (FAPU). Its purpose was to expose the reactionary nature of the ruling junta and the role of the U.S. in the coup that brought the junta to power on Oct. 15. The march gathered in Soyopango, an industrial area in northeast San Salvador and the sight of bloody repression by the national guard only five days earlier. Boldly defying the state of siege declared by the junta, the crowd of mostly workers and students marched toward the downtown Plaza de Libertad (Liberty Square) chanting "Junta and CIA—They're the same thing!" Halfway into town they were met by police who fired into the front ranks of the march.

This vicious attack on anti-government protestors is further proof that the self-proclaimed "revolutionary" junta is nothing but a continuation, under a new disguise, of the same terrorism against the people as that of the Romero dictatorship it replaced. While a member of the junta was proclaiming, "We aspire to a new and just society and reject the decadent civilization that has been maintained at a high cost to the population", junta troops killed over 100 people in the first 5 days after the coup. Most of these were in the working class zones of Mejicanos, San Marcos and Soyopango where workers and students erected barricades and called for opposition to the junta.

The government supports its claim that "calm prevails in El Salvador" by the fact that relatively little gunfire has been heard. Morgue employees in San Salvador report that indeed most of the dead have no bullet wounds; tens of the bodies were beheaded by machetes, a terror technique taught in the U.S. counter-insurgency training school in Panama, and fifteen others had been tied behind cars and dragged on the pavement until death.

The young officers of the junta, anxious to preserve their cloak of "being democratic" blame the repression on individual soldiers who are "difficult to retrain." That is understandable, since one of the main "retrainers" is Col. Eugenie Vites Casanova, a commander of the National Guard, which has carried out the massacre of hundreds of people within the last two years, especially in the countryside. Casanova was one of the original five officers who carried out the coup. He is so well trained that he ordered the execution of his own son because he was suspected of being a homosexual.

The attack on the Oct. 22 march is a sign that the junta does not have everything under control, and in fact is very afraid of the revolutionary movement of the people. The government has recently launched a "beautification" campaign in San Salvador to paint over all the anti-government and anti-U.S. slogans that covered the walls of the city. This fact speaks directly to what the purpose of the junta is, and what its replacement of Romero really means. It is a move, orchestrated and implemented by the U.S. government, to difuse the political time bomb that exists in El Salvador. The five man ruling group exists to prevent, in its own words, "class warfare."

Thus, at the same time it is intensifying oppression against the people and viciously attacking their struggle, it is putting forward a "human rights" program, promising to change, in the words of Roman Mayorga Quiroz, one of the civilian members of the junta, the "socio-economic structure of the country which is the main reason for its poverty." The promises announced by the junta include: recognizing and establishing relations with Nicaragua, free elections before the scheduled date in 1982 and a reorganization of the security police supposedly including holding officials responsible for acts of corruption and brutality.

The junta also profusely pledged to investigate all missing persons and open the gates of the prisons to a group including representatives of the Mother's Committee on Disappeared Persons, while announcing an amnesty for all political prisoners to take effect on Wednesday, Oct. 24. Suddenly, the day before the proposed release, Col. Jaime Abdul Gutierrez, a junta member, announced, "We have met with the chiefs of all the security police forces, and there are no political prisoners and there are no clandestine jails." Perhaps these same security police officials have also decided to avoid the much-touted investigations into "acts of corruption and brutality" by destroying the evidence.

The junta is paying particular attention to ruthlessly suppressing everything that exposes U.S. intervention in El Salvador. While statements denying U.S. involvement in the coup were among the first words out of their mouths, the junta itself has "Made in USA" stamped all over its backside. The two military members of the junta, Col. Gutierrez and Majano, both received military training in the U.S. All three civilian members of the junta, Mario Andino , a respected liberal businessman, Pierre Manuel Ungo, head of the social-democratic National Revolutionary Movement (MNR) and employee at Phelps Dodge Corporation, and the abovementioned Quiroz, a former rector of the jesuit run Central American University, all attended school in the U.S.

The latest issues of Time and Newsweek magazines, are filled with statements and quotes from the State Department and other government officials as to how overjoyed they were at news of the coup. One State Dept. official said, "It (the coup—RW) is the best piece of news we've had in this office for a long time." In fact, Hodding Carter, a State Dept. spokesman, confirmed earlier in the week, that "naturally there were conversations with our Embassy." The U.S. government was kept informed of all details of the coup from the early planning stages. And, according to Time, it was an American diplomat who told Romero on the day of the coup that he had until 3 p.m. to get out of the country.

The State Dept. has held a series of meetings with the "moderate" parties that formerly opposed Romero, but are now a part of the junta, principally the Christian Democrats (PDC) and the MNR. In fact a leader of the PDC visited New York a short while ago and spoke at a special meeting on El Salvador called by the Council of the Americas, a Rockefeller funded group which includes representatives of the Bank of America, IBM, Phelps Dodge, Morgan Guarantee Trust, and City Bank Corps. Clearly the U.S. engineered this little transfer of power from Romero to the current junta from the beginning.

Tremendous super-profits are sucked out of El Salvador's coffee, sugar plantations, and the low-wage textile and electronics plants. But even more than their profits, U.S. imperialism desperately does not want to lose another domino in the chain that threatens their rule of the entire Central American region. The U.S. imperialists have learned from Nicaragua and from Iran before it, that continued support for isolated dictators like Somoza and the Shah is not advisable if it can be avoided. So the U.S. engineered the coup in El Salvador to try and put a "liberal" and even a "revolutionary" mask on the dictatorship.

The key to the U.S. strategy is uniting the moderate or intermediate parties behind the junta, while the U.S. pulls the junta's strings. In this they have been to some degree successful so far. Not only the Christian Democrats and the MNR, but some other forces as well have given their support to the coup. These are essentially forces that opposed Romero in the past because of his repressive measures and because he rigged the 1977 election, but they have not targetted U.S. imperialism as the enemy of the Salvadorian people. To these people, the U.S.-manipulated coup provides the hope of containing the mass struggle short of revolution, which would pose a threat to their political and economic positions, and for some of them it has brought the opportunity to scramble for a piece of the political action, using their positions as leaders of the opposition to Romero as capital in the scramble for new positions which were denied to them previously.

One important example of such an intermediate element is Archbishop Romero of the Catholic Church. He was a strong opponent of the General Romero dictatorship, criticizing government oppression from his pulpit on Sundays. For those actions, he became popular among large sections of the masses. This popular stand he takes is of particular importance for the junta. Now, calling on the people to lay down their weapons, he sermonizes about the junta, "its beautiful promises are not dead letters, but rather a real hope that a new era has begun for our country."

Another junta supporter is the "communist" party of El Salvador (PCES), which expressed the hope that the junta would "take the country out of the profound political, economic and social crisis that 50 years of military government had brought it to." This expression of support came as no surprise to revolutionaries in El Salvador, one of whom told the RW, "The CP's positions are more rightist than the Christian Democrats." Closely linked to the Soviet Union and Cuba, the PCES has dwindled in influence in the last five years because of its consistent preaching of the "peaceful road" and elections, even while the struggle of the masses was being drowned in blood. Apparently the PCES, which is said to have some ties with Ungo's MNR, sees the new government as an opportunity to reverse that situation—at least among some capitalist elements in the country.

The junta has also managed to gain support from a group called The People's Revolutionary Army (ERP), and its mass organization The February 28th Popular League (LP28). The ERP called for insurrection immediately after the coup, losing a number of fighters in battle against the junta in the first three days. Then in a treacherous change of position, while some of its members were still fighting the junta's troops, it announced a truce and declared support for the "progressive elements" within the junta. This kind of 180 degree turnaround also is nothing new for this group, whose nine year history has been full of swings from a guerrilla actions and isolation from the masses, to pleading with the government for a few reforms.

There is tremendous opposition to the junta among the masses of people. In addition to strong opposition from many revolutionary groups, the largest union federation in the country, the National Federation of Workers Unions (FENASTRAS), smaller federations of construction workers and public employees unions, and a textile workers union, have all called for opposition to the junta.

International condemnation of the U.S. and support for the Salvadorian people's struggle has greatly increased since the coup. In Guatemala, a guerrilla group occupied a village and distributed leaflets which included a statement of support for the El Salvador peoples struggle. Many Americans joined El Salvadorian exiles in a demonstration of 300 in San Francisco on October 21st, demanding that U.S. imperialism get its bloody hands off El Salvador.

The western press continued to say that everything was calm in San Salvador. So calm in fact that when a truck tire blew out on Oct. 20, over 100 government soldiers in a convoy hit the dirt and raked the front of the El Camino Real Hotel with machine gun fire, narrowly missing International Press Service reporters and members of the OAS human rights commission who were staying there while investigating reports of human rights violations in El Salvador. Clearly, both the new junta and its U.S. masters recognize El Salvador is still a powderkeg, and are desperately searching for a solution for their serious control problems. In fact, it is a sign of the real weakness of U.S. imperialism in the country that it is forced to bring down greater and more vicious repression against the people at the same time it is trying to give the junta a "human rights" face. Recently, some U.S. officials, such as National Security advisor Brzezinksi have been more openly calling for the resumption of direct U.S. military aid to El Salvador—aid that has been routed through Israel since 1976 to preserve the illusion that the U.S. "opposed" the "human rights" violations of the Romero government. In fact, it is undoubtedly not a coincidence that the person injured by flying glass in the El Camino Real Hotel incident was a retired U.S. army Master Sergeant —supposedly vacationing in San Salvador.

As we go to press, inspite of the fact that the junta has just lifted the state of seige, the situation in El Salvador remains very unstable. Whether or not the junta can consolidate its hold, it's clear that the U.S. is prepared to go to greater and more brutal lengths to try and maintain its domination of El Salvador. ■ good facilities. They do not have enough teachers and it will take them a long time to train teachers, and doctors. So Cuba trains them and it gives them an opportunity to bring youth to Cuba to have doctors. It is the same as sending Cuban youth to the Soviet Union. There is nothing to be amazed at when you see children on their parents crying when they leave each other. Sometimes you travel within your country and your mother is sad to see you leave.

The western press does not publish all the support that we give to these countries. They sensationalize things that they want.

N.N : Considering what we know about Cuban, how much is America now, like Bastista then and what can Cuban education do for America to allieviate the conditions that exist here now•

P S This is surprising and interesting question. I think that a lot of similarities can be found between Batista and the U.S. These are that private property ownership existed under the two societies. Exploitation, discrimination and other forms of oppression are the same. The difference is the Bastista was a lackey, a puppet of the U.S. Whatever he wanted he had to consult the U.S. ambassador. I lived through those times on October 1958 I was put in jail as a revolutionary. You could not deny that, because U.S. embassy gave me a report, which proves Bastista was a puppet. As far as our helping you from an educational point of view when relations between our countries become normal, one of the spheres in which our revolution has really advanced and has been recognized and admitted by the United Nations is education and public health. Our country could contribute that experience in the same way you could contribute technology and science which could be of help to us. Despite all the contradiction that America has the country has advanced the area of technology and science. We would not be against exchange in these areas.

N N How much political dessent is allowed in Cuba• The reason I ask this question because many people at UMass think that if they went to Cuba they would not he allowed to speak out against Castro.

In Cuba, there is freedom of expression. What we can actually insure is that the Cuban people really love Fidel and not from a mystical point of view. Fidel led our revolutionary forces and he has been able to free our country of backwardness and discrimination.

Asians Do Not Value Life ??

By Richard Mei, Jr.

Gen. William C. Westmoreland, during 1964-1968 was one of the most powerful men in shaping "America's destiny" during the Vietnam War. At the peak of the American intervention in South East Asia, Westmoreland was the Commander in chief of all U.S. armed forces in South Vietnam.

Regarded as a "Hawk," Westmoreland was interviewed in the 1975 Academy Award winning film "Hearts and Minds," a documentary of America's involvement in the Vietnamese War. It was in that film that Westmoreland said that "Asians do not value life as much as Westerners and "to Asians, life is cheap"

More recently and closer to home, Westmoreland spoke last week at Smith College and reaffrimed his infamous remarks.

This is more than a slap in the face to Asians and Asian Americans. It reflects the twisted mentality that people in power have and the distorted thinking that they espouse. It is also another ramification of White American superiority and their low regard for "inferior" races.

Simply, these are insulting and racist statements. Westmoreland and other cold,insensitive criminals used this kind of rationalizing to justify the indiscriminate slaughter of millions of Asians during World War II, the Korean War, and the Vietnamese War. When U.S. G.I.'s became convinced that life is cheap in Asia, then killing them became okay. As a result, they will not have any guilt feelings about killing Asian men, women and babies. This kind of thinking has fostered massacres such as at My Lai. U.S. G.I's did not distinguish between the enemy and their allies or between civilians and soldiers. To them, all Asians have been reduced to "Gooks" and "Gooks" are expendable. "Gooks" do not care about their lives, but White Americans supposedly do.

At Smith, Westmoreland went further by citing the plight of the Indochinese refugees, especially the boat people as a further example of this logic.

Does Westmoreland honestly believe that Asians do not care about living? That they like to be shot at? Bombed upon? Napalmed to death?

Proponents of this "no value for life" reasoning points outs numerous examples as proof, all of which are seen with shortsightedness. For example, they point out that during World War II, Japanese Kamikaze pilots sacrificed themselves because they did not value their lives. This is false. Late in the War, many Japanese volunteered for these suicide missions because they cherished their lives so much that to live any further with defeat would be to humiliating that to die with honor meant more than to continue living in infamy and shame. The Japanese love to live as much as Americans yet Americans fail to understand Japanese mentality and philosophy. These same people also point out, if Asians value life, then why do other Asians nations such as Thailand, Indonesia and the Philippines turn away thousands of helpless fellow Asians (the Vietnames and Cambodian refugees)? Westmoreland and company however, do not realize that there are many valid economic, social, political and even racial reasons why these countries are forced to reject these starving and dying people who want to live.

Did American, British, French and German commanders value the lives of their soldiers when they threw away hundreds of thousands of lives for an area of land, no bigger than Central Park, called Verdun during World War I? Did Westmoreland value the lives of 55,000 American men killed and thousands more wounded in Vietnam?

General Westmoreland has so infuriated not only Asians and Asian-Americans with his stupid remarks, but he has also angered and astounded other White Americans as well. If Westmoreland continues to make these racist statements, I seriously wonder if he values even his own life.

i walked thru chinatown
one warm summer night as flies buzzed and licked their mouths around dried dog turd on the scratchy sidewalk

while the gressroots sat on store-fronts watching the tourists parade by with filled shopping bags of fortune cookies and dried licheenuts

their heads bent, staring wide-eyed at oriental picturebook replicas come to life. "Are you really Chinese?" These pale-skin american foreigners, dressed up in perfune smelling body oils like some incensed salad; they sniff the smells of seameseeds and dried shrimp from nearby markets, yet turn their noses from the dark alleyways where sewer stench and sickening body fumes of drunks lying in greasy gutters choke even the rats.

I walked on, past the gift shops with cheap trinkets and plastic buddahs that smile saying "Made in Taiwan" on their flat asses.
Past the teahouses and bakeries

where a "thousand exotic delights" pickled-glazed-roasted-fried-smoked-tempt wayfarers. "Oh George, dear, you must get a snapshot of the exquisite pagoda telephone booth. My those Chinese are so clever." From the corner of my eye I watched a mother hugging her young daughter as they walked home, swaying on the sidewalk like drunken women laughing and bumping for each other. I entered the China Cinema. "Fist of Fury" blazed in black letters on the flaming red screen and the jook-koks and jook-sings cheered and booed as the drama transpired and their superhero waged deadly battle with the forces of evil in a kung-fu apocalypse. Ah, Mr. Lee, Mr. Lee, how the people cheer you. We cheer because you are one of us, a yellow man

trashing any and everyone white-black-yellow who didn't say you was boss man of all martial arts, being the world's greatest. Even jim kelly thinks you real bad, Mr. Lee.

chuck norris knows you baaad for sure.
My friend and i rooted you on we laughed when you whipped out your nunchakus and took on 30 karate, boxing, and judo masters as english sub-titles flashed translated sound effects. Bopping them one by one-seems so easy-like swatting flies-with not a drop of sweat on your armpits. We even stayed to see the second showing, hiding under the seats with the spilled popcorn. Mr. Lee you could do anything and your weren't even a shaolin priest. Mr. Tough, Mr.

Kung-fu king caressing with one hand and killing with the other.

Ah, Mr. Lee, Mr. Lee,
how the people cheer you. We cheer you.

But know this:

we aren't all kung-fu supermen invulnerable and impervious to weapons, fists, kick, as well as love. We are human, brother, and what we need now is some basic lessons in humanity for our young people. We need a hero who can bleed tears so that we may understand what it means to be a real man.

I left the theatre and walked onto the night street as young teenagers under the lantern street lights fantasized, throwing "death kicks" and "dragon punches" fooling with their buddies-trying to impress yawning girl friends and i thought of the mother and her daughter as i walked towards home.

UMass Horrors'?!

By RON MILLER
Collegian Staff

University officials reacted negatively last week to an article that appears in this month's Boston Magazine.

Chancellor Henry Koffler, calling the article "outrageous," said, "It's grossly unfair to parents and students. It's unjust to law abiding, respectful students and the parents who raised them."

The article, "The UMass Horrors," discusses violence and racism on campus. It includes statements such as, "The violence is everywhere. Every student has friends who were mugged, raped or even killed."

Boston Magazine and Marshall were unavailable for comment.

Dean Field called the article "pretty awful." He referred to the story as "one of the dirty kind of smears like something in the National Enquirer."

Student Government Association co-President Brian Burke, quoted in the article, said the author (Megan Marshall) depicted UMass badly. "It just isn't fair," he said.

"It is a very interesting article. It reveals the way Marshall thinks. It's so bad most people who read it won't believe it," former Chancellor Randolph Bromery said.

'If she (Marshall) wants to sell yellow journalism, she'd do quite well.' —Bromery

Marshall calls the campus "an urban slum" with "violence an epidemic." She described university dorms as looking like "bombed out shells," and referred to the student body as "23,000 post-adolescents."

She states "studies show one in twenty women are sexually assaulted in their years at UMass." Officials interviewed questioned where she got her figures. The article also claims that "entire dormitory floors are supportive of racist attitudes."

Marshall says that vandalism runs up a tab of $250,000 yearly. John Findley, Assistant Director of Maintenance and Operations at Residential Resource Management said the total bill for fiscal 1979 was $137,000, not $250,000 as quoted.

Dean Field said this number is even more misleading because damage and vandalism are part of the same bill. "You can't have a lot of healthy young people without some damage. Damage is not necessarily vandalism," he said.

Marshall quotes Rob Gilbert, former Head of Residence in Washington Upper, as saying students refer to Washington Tower in the Southwest Residential Area as "Death Dorm." "I never said it. I never put those two words together," Gilbert said.

The story refers to the suicide of Karen Messner last year in Washington. "Messner's parents suspect that she had been molested, possibly raped," Marshall wrote. There was no indication in the police reports that Messner had been sexually assaulted before her suicide, UMass Chief of Police Robert Joyce said.

"I didn't get anything from police reports that indicated Karen's parents thought something had happened," Bromery said.

Bromery referred to the fact the article portrays off-

Violence on campus

Koffler - 'profoundly shocked'

By HENRY KOFFLER
Special to the Collegian

I want every student on this campus to know how profoundly shocked I am over the extent of recent antisocial behavior in our academic community. It is true that most of the damage to persons and property was done by intruders and that the vast majority of students abhor such excess. Yet, too often we stand by helplessly watching others commit acts of vandalism and violence without crying out that this must stop or trying to identify the offenders.

In a community devoted to enlightment and service, we cannot continue to tolerate acts that violate the dignity, privacy, or property of others. I am calling for your support in my determined effort to eradicate such abuses.

First, I shall shortly announce and begin to enforce efforts which will keep off University property, late at night, outsiders who are not invited guests. This policy will be implemented with great care for the rights of all people needing the resources of this university.

Second, I have asked Vice Chancellor Dennis Madson and his staff to enforce vigorously all existing regulations regarding inappropriate behavior, and have asked them to determine the applicability to other campus situations of the judicial system developed and applied by students in certain dormitories.

I have also asked them to take additional steps, if they are needed.

I am aware that the pathologies of behavior that have occurred here are happening also in numerous other institutions and elsewhere in society. No doubt they are caused or aggravated by the bewilderment, anxiety, or outrage that many of us feel as we confront complexity, uncertainty, injustice, and unacceptable social conditions. However, this knowledge provides little solace, nor can our compassion justify tolerance of those who violate the rights of others.

Young or old, we are all in the same crowded boat which we must attempt to steer towards a better future. The purpose of this University is to help us develop understanding, commitments, and a sense of direction and collective responsibility.

Destructive activities by a minority which undermine that purpose shared by the majority will no longer be condoned.

I shall seek your advice as we attempt to halt the thoughtless and violent actions of a few.

I need your support.

The majority of decent, hard working, and responsible students have been silent for too long!

Computers: The numbers game

By LAURIE FULLERTON
Collegian Staff

"Health Services? I'm really sick and I need an appointment."

"What's your student number please?"

"Uh, I can't remember, I'm really sick and..."

"You mean your don't know your student number!?"

"N-no. Hey, I'm really sick and..."

"I'm sorry, without a student number there is no way we can help."

Is there a bit of irony in this? Is our true identity on this campus a seven-digit number? Perhaps not, but computerization is a growing part of our daily lives. The computer gives us the right to be in a class, obtain a mealbook or cash a check. The computer checks out library books and adds up purchase totals at the University Store.

The computer is virtually everywhere; it even moves along in back pockets, zipped up in a blue vinyl case. The computer is no longer a vision of the future' it is here today and its variety of uses is phenomenal.

On the surface computers seem to be an impersonal reminder of who knows your personal business, including debts at the Bursar's office. Conrad Wogrin, head of the campus Computer Science Center, said UMass has two different systems. In the Whitmore Administration Building is a machine which gets students in and out of college, perhaps frustrating things along the way OSCAR. He controls all administrative work from pre-registration to final report cards.

The other main campus computer is "The Brain" located in the Graduate Research Center. This computer consists of an intertwined mesh of wires that can perform 1 million operations per second. Students type small computer programs into the Brain. The computers are used as an outlet for research, imagination and experimentation, Wagrin said.

Computer specialist in the School of Education Howard Peele, said "The computer creates a rich and productive environment. With its growing use in teaching, there is the opportunity to rethink the way we go about education.

"Today children use computers for problem solving, tutorials and creative simulations and games. But their acceptance has been slow because of a certain awe or mystique about computers. The actual idea is to create different methods for teaching, rather than a computer just spewing out facts."

In the campus computer rooms, students do not just use the computers for homework assignments.

"There are students doing brain research and studying old plays on those computers. If an engineer student wants to try and build a bridge, he can compute it first," Wagrin said.

Computers are becoming smaller, following the same trend as calculators, Peele said. Their availability is greater and their acceptance is growing, he said.

Are we only seven-digit numbers in the days of many digits? Does it all compute?

"Hey, 3988567, hows it processing?"

"Affirmatively, thank you."

Boston mayoral hits polls

Associated Press

BOSTON — Mayor Kevin H. White and his re-election challenger, Joseph F. Timilty, scoured the neighborhoods yesterday, trying to lock up the last stray votes before today'selection ended a campaign punctuated by racial tension.

White held rallies in the Hyde Park, West Roxbury and Roslindale sections and toured the neighborhoods' business centers.

Timilty's campaign took him along a similar route, including a bowling alley in Hyde Park and a walking tour in West Roxbury.

Neither scheduled visits to the predominantly black neighborhoods, and neither candidate had the endorsement of Boston's black leaders.

Candidates plan debate

LOS ANGELES(AP)— Campaign officials for the three top Democratic contenders for the 1980 presidential nomination have engaged in "preliminary discussions" to set a series of debates prior to the Feb. 26 New Hampshire primary, Gov. Edmund G. Brown Jr. said today.

Brown said his campaign manager, Tom Quinn, discussed the prospect of a debate between Brown and Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass., with Paul Kirk, Kennedy's national political director, in a phone call Sunday.

Kennedy first suggested a three-way debate during a campaign stop in Charleston, W. Va., Saturday,, and received an acceptance telegram from Quinn the same day.

Briefcase hints intrigue

STAMFORD, Conn.(AP)— A number of contradictions surfaced yesterday involving the alleged theft of a briefcase containing purportedly "secret documents' and an explosive device.

Police said a car stolen Oct. 5 was recovered in neighboring Greenwich Saturday but the briefcase with explosive device attached to it was missing from the vehicle.

Lt. Gregory Tomlin said the man who the car and briefcase was stolen from was not, as originally believed, a "high ranking Air Force official" but a civilian contractor who does work for the government.

Authorities said the contractor had received the documents from an aerospace firm, which also does business with the government, not from the Air Force.

"The Air Force isn't sure at this time what documents he has," Tomlin said.

Bill filed to repeal pay hike

BOSTON(AP)— Republican lawmakers filed a bill yesterdayto repeal the sizable pay hikes the Legislature awarded itself, the governor and other top executive officers last week.

Though overwhelmingly outnumbered by Democrats, the GOP contingent vowed to try to make the bill's repeal the first order of business when the Legislature returns to Beacon Hill in January.

If their effort fails, as seems likely, House Minority Leader William G. Robinson of Melrose has reaffirmed that he will launch a petition drive to force the issue to a referendum next November.

Repeal would cancel a 34 per cent across-the-board raise slated for lawmakers over a four-year period, worth a total of about $6,000 per member.

Iran students seize U.S., British offices

By The Associated Press

Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini's student followers, already holding scores of hostages in the U.S. Embassy in Tehran, seized two U.S. consulates and the British Embassy yesterday in an escalating war of nerves against "the great Satan, America" and its "evil" British ally.

The students and Iranian leader Khomeini demanded that the United States and Britain hand over two "criminals" for trial — the deposed Shah Mohammad Reza Pahlavi, hospitalized in New York, and former Iranian Prime Minister Shahpour Bakhtiar, living in exile in Western Europe.

But the Carter administration rejected the demand that it expel the shah, and the British said they did not have Bakhtiar — that he was living in France.

Radio Tehran said the students holding the American Embassy also demanded that the Iranian government end all ties with the United States. And Iran's petroleum minister said a cutoff of oil exports to America was possible.

Broadcasts of the government-run radio, monitored in London, said students seized the U.S. consulates in Tabriz in northwest Iran and in the southern city of Shiraz. The State Department said another mob occupied and ransacked the Iran-American Society building, a cultural center, in Isfahan, central Iran.

No injuries were reported, but it was not known whether any staff members were taken hostage.

The British Foreign Office later reported that students invaded the British Embassy in an apparently peaceful takeover. It said some staff members were believed inside the embassy at the time, but it was not known whether they were taken hostage.

The Moslem clergyman Khomeini, in a speech in his headquarters city of Qum, openly endorsed the takeover of the U.S. Embassy and said it had been a center of "plots" by "the great Satan, America," Radio Tehran reported. His representative Ayatollah Seyyed Khansari declared that America, Russia and Britain were each "more evil than the others," the broadcast said.

The State Department said it continued to receive indirect assurances from the students that the hostages taken when they seized the U.S. Embassy on Sunday "all are well."

The department estimated that 60 Americans were being held in the embassy. Previous reports said seven or eight Iranian employees also were held.

The Carter administration was relying on the Iranian government's efforts to secure the hostages' release, department spokesmen said. But the real power in Iran lies with Khomeini's Revolutionary Council of Moslem clergymen, and not with the government of Prime Minister Mehdi Bazargan.

NRC chair announces

Nukes near cities may be closed

By TOM RAUM
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The chairman of the Nuclear Regulatory Commission acknowledged Monday that certain nuclear plants near populated areas may have to be shut down because of potential problems evacuating residents in the event of an emergency.

Joseph M. Hendrie, testifying before a House subcommittee, also announced that an NRC freeze on new nuclear plants — imposed shortly after the March 28 accident at Three Mile Island — is being extended at least until spring.

He said the added time is needed so the recommendations of the presidential commission on Three Mile Island can be fully examined by policy makers.

The delay directly effects four plants that had been scheduled to open by the end of this year, and keeps another 88 plants in various stages of construction in a holding pattern.

There are now 70 nuclear plants in operation in the United States.

Rep. Toby Moffett, D-Conn., noted that a number of the plants now in operation are older ones, built before the current policy of constructing them away from populated areas.

For people who live near the Indian Point nuclear plant near New York City or the Zion plant near Chicago, "there is no evacuation plan that can help you," Moffett said.

"If we are really concerned about safety, why don't we shut down some existing plants?" he asked.

"It's a possibility, Mr. Moffett," Hendrie replied.

However, Hendrie was quick to note that he wasn't advocating shutting down either of the plants mentioned by Moffett, saying "we're going to come to a very hard-rock place soon, but we're not up against it yet."

He said the closer a plant is to a populated area "the time for evacuation gets longer and longer."

An NRC spokesman said the four plants that will be unable to open this year because of the freeze are: Salem II in New Jersey, North Anna II in Virginia, Diablo Canyon in California and Sequoyah I in Tennessee.

Three other plants — Zimmer in Ohio, McGuire in North Carolina and Braidwood I in Illinois — are due for completion next year and also will be affected.

Study space out of reach at Baker

By VICTORIA JONES
Collegian Staff

Umass students are putting a premium on study space this semester due to the library's closing. But for students at Baker dormitory in the Central Residential Area, the issue of study space has, unfortunately, developed into "a needless situation," said dorm co-President Loretta Sposito.

The Central Area Women's Center contains valuable study apace but cannot be used for studying although the center is not using it either, dorm co-President Brian Stewart said.

The space cannot be used for studying until dorm officers arrange to do so with the center coordinator, Stewart said. However, there is presently no coordinator, he said.

"The room is unattainable until action is taken, and until that time, Baker residents will suffer from an already limited study space," Stewart said. "If these room (in the center) were being used, there would be no problem, but there is no excuse for wasted space due to lack of organization."

Central-Orchard Hill Area Director Josephy Battista is currently looking for a coordinator, Stewart said.

Sposito recommended a coordinator be found immediately, and the space should be given to Baker temporarily or the center moved.

"Lounges in Baker are not conducive to studying. Many times they are locked, and they are never clean," Baker resident K. Jean Kelley said.

Raindrops keep falling in CC

By RICHARD NAGLE
Collegian Staff

When it rains it pours, and pour it does in the Campus Center after a rainfall.

Despite sunny weather yesterday, leaks in the Campus Center roof provided indoor precipitation in several places throughout the building.

Building operations director Dudley Bridges said, "The leaks have always been there. We just try to contain the water."

The lack of a plastic sheet, torn down during Halloween weekend, explained the severity of yesterday's downpour next to the campus assistance desk, Bridges said. A new sheet has since been placed there.

Leaks occurred in several spots on the concourse level; in front of the Building Operations Office, in the Music Library and in the Collegian office, and others.

The persistent leak problem has plagued the building since it opened in 1970, prompting University officials last year to retain the Detroit-based engineering firm of Construction Consultants, Inc. to investigate the situation. Their report, printed in February, includes diagrams illustrating 12 points where "a waterproofing membrane" has separated from the concrete roofing system. This report was made public in September, through a request under the Freedom Information Act by Legal Services attorney Michael Pill.

Feminist analyzes transsexuality

By ELIZABETH HERMANCE
Collegian Staff

For Women's Studies Assistant Professor Janice Raymond, what started out as a doctoral dissertation in 1971 and evolved into her Ph.D. thesis in 1977, was this year incorporated into a book, entitled The Transsexual Empire — The Making of the She-Male. Raymond's book analyzes transsexualism, and its correlations with femminism.

Dr. Raymond, UMass and Hampshire College Assistant Professor of Women's Studies and Medical Ethics, received her Ph.D. from Boston College. Not a newcomer to the feminist scene, Raymond has lectured and written extensively on feminism, religion, ethics and biomedical issues. Her interest in Women's issues she said in a recent Collegian interview, stems from her graduate school studies in which she began to seriously consider women's role in today's society. At UMass, she has supported many causes, including a Collegian sit-in a year and a half ago by women supporting the establishment of a daily page devoted to women's news. Raymond says she is still dissatisfied with the representation of women in the Collegian.

Raymon's book is a serious statement about the feminist movement and its relationship to transsexualism. She points out that four times as many men have sex-change operations as women. She examines some of the possible reasons for this, as well as exploring sex-role stereotyping, and the definitions of maleness and femaleness. She analyzes how the existence of the "Transsexual Empire" is evidence of the continuation of deeply rooted religious and cultural prejudices against women. In simpler terms, what does transsexualism have to do with feminism, or female sex-role stereotyping?

This concept is the focal point of Raymond's book. If surgery can create women, Raymond asks, what does this

Leftist groups move to end Klan

By DAVID L. LANGFORD
Associated Press

The Ku Klux Klan has lately been meetingmilitant resistance from leftist organizations in what one robed wizard calls the start of a "race war."

But skin color apparently was not the issue when several carloads of white men sprayed bullets into an anti-Klan rally staged by an avowed communist organization in Greensboro, N.C., on Saturday, killing five persons and wounding nine others. Four of those killed were white. One was black.

"It wasn't one white group against one black group," said H.M. "Mickey" Michaux, a black who is the U.S. attorney in Greensboro."It was one white group against another white group that was trying to elicit support from the black community."

The group which drew about 100 demonstrators to the "Death to the Klan" rally was the Communist Workers Party, U.S.A, which until about a month ago was named the Workers Viewpoint Organization. Espousing the principals of Marx, Lenin and Mao Tse-tung, the organization has been active in trying to organize workers in North Carolina's textile mills.

Another left-leaning group attacking the Klan with more than rhetoric is the International Committee Against Racism, which was born in Brooklyn in the early 1970s and has staged demonstrations in Virginia and Mississippi and elsewhere in recent months.

About 20 INCAR protesters broke through police lines at a KKK rally in Virginia Beach, Va., on Oct. 5, grabbed the robes of two Klansmen and knocked another to the ground. They burned the robes in the street.

It was two self-professed INCAR members, a man and a woman, who jumped up on a stage Monday and pelted New York Mayor Edward Koch with eggs as he was welcoming 3,000 persons to a meeting of the American Public Health Association.

"Koch is a fascist," the woman said.

In the meantime, the Communist Workers Party said Monday it will conduct a funeral march for its slain members in Greensboro on Sunday, despite a city ban on parade permits.

Fourteen held in rally killings

By MONTE PLOTT
Associated Press

GREENSBORO, N.C. — Fourteen men, described by a judge as "imminently dangerous to others of the community," were ordered held without bond yesterday in a shooting rampage that left five persons dead at an anti-Ku Klux Klan rally.

Persons outside the courtroom said they could hear voices singing "God Bless America" and "Onward Christian Soldiers" in the holding cell where the suspects awaited their court appearances.

Four persons died at the scene of Saturday's shootings in a predominantly black housing project. A fifth victim, Michael Nathan, a physician from Durham, died Monday at a Greensboro hospital. Nine other persons were injured.

Twelve men were arrested a few hundred feet from the scene of the shootings, where gunmen fired repeatedly into a crowd gathered for an antiKlan march sponsored by the leftists Workers Viewpoint Organization. Police seized a yellow van that was packed with pistols, shotguns and rifles.

Each of the 12 arrested Saturday faces four counts of murder and one count of conspiracy to commit murder.

Amherst selectmen hear dump proposal

By SEAN HARVEY
Collegian Staff

The Amherst Board of Selectman last night heard a proposal to construct an office park complex on land abutting the town dump.

Gordon Hall III, owner of Amherst Fields Commercial and Industrial Company, presently owns 44 acres of land alongside the town dump. Hall is expecting a special designation of the 60-acre town dump, which will allow him to take title to certain parcels of dump land.

In order for land to be designated it must be "blighted open", "decadent", or "substandard" area, a selectman's report stated. The land also must not conflict with zoning, subdivision, health or town building ordinances, by-law, rules or regulations.

The town dump land is a blighted, open area containing a contaminated well 800 yards northwest of it, the report stated. There is also a large auto dump on the land, and the dump itself creates odors and lowers property values in the area, the report stated.

The selectmen and the Planning Board must approve the designation of the area as 121A, the report stated.

The selectman also passed a resolution prohibiting parking on certain streets near Puffer's Pond in North Amherst. The streets include both sides of Mill Road, from Summer Street to State Street, both sides of Sand Hill Road from State Street to Cushing Road, and one side of State Street from the intersection of Mill Road to Cushman Bridge.

The selectmen passed this resolution after a summer study showed that on four separate days in July and August, more than 50 cars were parked in the State Street and Mill Road area—exceeding the limit of 50.

Selectwoman Diana Romer said she opposed the parking ban because "it will force people to walk long distances from their cars to the pond." Four separate occasions when the parking limit was exceeded, do not warrant a ban, she said.

The selectmen approved an application for a manager change at the UMass Faculty Club. The new manager is Myrtle Blanchard, replacing S. Fletcher.

The selectmen heard a report from the Town Manager Louis Hayward on the possibility of the Amtrak Montreal line stopping in Amherst. If there is a stop here, it would probably not start service before January 1981, Hayward said.

The Boston Horrors

Amira I. Rahman

Letter From Amherst
The UMass Horrors
The most talented students in the state choose this university as their first choice.

I feel guilty.

I also feel partly responsible for the distorted and contrived article which appears in this month's Boston magazine. You see, my photo illustrates it. I received a call about a month ago from Boston saying they had a story in hand on "Vandalism at UMass" and they needed a photo. I was ecstatic at the prospect of my first byline in a national magazine. I also was pleased that a prominent source would be discussing vandalism on campus. Perhaps, I thought, the administration would finally wake up and do something about the need for increased lighting on campus, and stricter enforcement of the endangering students codes.

Shock and dismay greeted me when I read the final article by Megan Marshall which appears on page 73. Granted, it is factually based, but it is distorted beyond recognition. It makes it seem as though every student at UMass is a boorish, toilet-paper and bottle throwing moron. Of course some of these people exist at UMass, but they also exist at (heaven forbit) Harvard and MIT.

I have lived in Southwest for all of my five semesters (two of them in a tower even!) and while I have been at times disgusted with the aftermath of a party weekend, I also realize that much of it is caused by non-students looking for excitment. They come up to party and reek havoc throughout the land. After all, it's not their school. They return home to tell wild stories of their adventures and bad-mouth the school.

I'm sick of the bum rap we get here. UMass is a highly respected school—outside of Massachusetts. Inside the state, the University is regarded a scum. I happen to think UMass does have its faults, but is still the finest school around. And I am proud to be here.

Amira Rahman is the Photo Editor of the Collegian and she won't be submitting photos to Boston magazine for a while.

From IQ's to fools

Elved Owens

It will come as no surprise to many that I have never fared very well in intelligence tests. Shuffling coloured blocks around is great fun, but as to its proper purpose it always defeats me. In high school I was always bewildered by mathamatical problems which insisted that I find out how much varnish would be needed to cover a strip eighteen inches wide around the edge of a floor of a circular room 25 feet in diameter. 'Buy a big can and varnish the doors as well,' was apparently the wrong answer.

So it might be the brooding resentment of an idiot that has always made me suspicious of MENSA, the organization for people with an absurdly high I.Q. It is called MENSA (Latin for table) because the round table is supposed to symbolize equality, or as one MENSA member put it: "At MENSA meetings one can talk to people on one's own level." Predictably, MENSA originated in England where class-consciousness, struggling in the face of disintegrating aristocracy and a House of Lords filling up with ex-Labour M.P.s sought a flag of status which was outwardly respectable. I.Q. seemed to fit in with the new meritocracy.

This time last year World Chairman of MENSA, Englishman Victor Serebriakoff visited the U.S. on a recruiting drive. "There's a kind of syllogism," he told the New York Times "which says: excellence implies selection which implies discrimination which implies rejection which is bad. Therefore excellence is bad. Now there's something wrong with that isn't there?"

I suppose there is, although I've never been convinced that the kind of thing intelligence tests measure has got much to do with what I recognise as human excellence. And whilst high I.Q. is probably as good an excuse as most for amiable conversation, and for getting drunk in congenial surroundings, it doesn't strike me as the best. "Nobody has to worry about making a fool of himself," said one MENSA member (who thinks he isn't a fool), "...because everybody else knows you are not a fool or you wouldn't be there." Oh, I see, so among the brilliant there are no fools? After years spent in Universities I find that hard to swallow, although to be fair one MENSA member, who was probably placed in a weighted sack shortly afterwards and left on a beach by his colleagues, did admit that cleverness and wisdom are not necessarily the same thing.

Why then do people with this seemingly arbitrary likeness feel the need to congregate? It seems that as well as high I.Q. they share a feeling of being outsiders. As one MENSA member is quoted as saying at a meeting: "Everybody in this room has been faced with significant social barriers because only two percent of the world was as smart as they were." That sounds like a flattering rationalization; isolation must be easier to live with when you tell yourself it is the result of having a monster brain and not the result of bad breath, boring conversation or the plain indifference of other people.

MENSA is harmless enough, but a society for people with high I.Q. makes as much sense to me as a society for one-legged Belgians or a society for bald women cab-drivers. Indeed, MENSA makes significantly less sense because it seeks to celebrate something as important as human intelligence by reducing it to an exclusive neurosis and a crude mathematical score. And who would want 'cleverness' that could be so crass?

Why disco 'sucks'

Chuck Edgerly

Gee, it all began so innocently; with high school dances organized by pragmatic youngsters who realized that a live band would be unaffordable.

At this early point, "disco" posed no threat and did not greatly alter our opinion of live music.

In the sixties there was the new craze: the discotheque; a place where one could socialize and dance to loud canned music. Even then, accoustical limitations foreshadowed the demise of discotheques because they just could not compare to live bands. Their brief popularity, despite the fact that the music was not purely danceable, showed that the public was ready to accept this "plastic" (or vinyl, as records are made out of vinyl) form of entertainment. Musicians saw the discotheque as a threat, and created the first "disco sucks" movement (they called it "Down With Disco—Live Music is Best").

Of course musicians now face a more serious threat. No longer are night clubs a place to readily get work, not since this "neo-muzak" had become so popular. The Sears and Roebuck mentality had set in—plastic people wearing plastic clothes dancing to plastic music. There are enough of these people for entertainment businesses to switch from live music to disco.

What is disco music, except supermarket music with a thump thump to it? Well, people didn't care about that, they just wanted cheap entertainment and flocked to discos.

Then came the biggie, Saturday Night Fever. John Travolta portrayed such a dashing loser in this anti-disco film that millions of dashing losers began to emulate the role. This movie popularized the whole disco life-style, made it legit and attractive. Ah, mass appeal—and "Disco Sucks" t-shirts. No longer was it just the musicians (who were now limited to very occasional work and weddings, where sacrificing quality for economy just does not happen. But goddam, there will soon be songs like "Disco Wedding Bells" and the musician will soon be in worse straits.) but also a group of aware people who didn't want to go for this crap.

Don't you see why disco sucks? It's the whole fast food, mass-produced, no quality, cheap, charge it plastic mentality. Be born, work, consume plastic, reproduce, die—that's the new life. Why bother with such frivolities as live music; it's just not necessary.

To the Editor:

As women of UMass, we feel it is necessary to address this issue: while attending a party at Phi Sigma Kappa a woman was confronted by what we feel is a common problem faced at fraternity parties. She became sick and was "graciously" shown to a room where she could rest. After becoming violently ill she awoke only to find a man in bed with her unbuttoning her shirt.

She called for a friend, who is a brother, for help. He escorted her to his room, she being under the impression that she would finally get some rest. Instead all she found was more harassment by he and his roommate. Unfortunately being so sick she was unable to leave and was helpless.

The point we are trying to make is that any woman should not have to fear this kind of treatment at any party at UMass. especially at a fraternity. Fraternities are supposedly a model of brotherhood, fellowship, and humanitarianism for others to follow.

We feel this sort of treatment is a form of RAPE!

This is just another example of the second rate role women are being stereotyped in our society today. We can only hope that this letter will cause men to reevaluate their notion that they have a right to take advantage of women, not only at parties, but at anytime.

—And you wonder why fraternity men are stereotyped as Frat Rats—WE DON'T!

Let George do it

To the Editor

This letter is directed toward George O'Brien about his column in the Collegian on Friday, November 2.

George, in your column, you stated that frisbee players "make me sick" and that "they think they are God's gift to Amherst." Is this because you yourself are inept in this area? You come off sounding like some bimbo when you state that, "It took me 15 years just to learn how to catch and throw one of those fool things..."

Since it took you 15 years to learn to throw and catch, maybe by the year 1993 you will be able to spin one on your finger.

Collegian does it again

To the Editor:

As I was quoted extensively in last Thursday's paper, I would like to clarify a few points. The statement that "the Goodell library fulfills most undergraduate needs" is not accurate. What I said was that the Goodell library serves undergraduate needs far better than graduate needs because the books and journals moved were primarily those used by undergraduates. The statement that access to the tower will be restricted to 500 people is also in error. I said that access would be restricted to somewhere between 200 and 500 depending on the safety inspector's recommendations.

Letters Policy

All letters to the editor are welcome, however, due to space limitations it would be nice if they were as short as possible.

They must be typed at 67 characters across and triple spaced.

Although the name will be held upon request, a name and adress is necessary for reference purposes only.

This page is the UMass community's page and the more input received, the more truthful the representation will be, for everyone. Thank you. S.K.

Women's Center plans evening Art Festival

The Southwest Women's Center will hold an Art Festival Nov. 13 through 20. The opening of the festival will be the evening of Nov. 13 from 7 to 9 p.m. The festival will feature crafts, paintings and photography. Refreshments will be served at the opening.

Tix for "The Babes" reduced half-price

Student ticket prices have been reduced half-price for "The Babes in Toyland," showing at the UMass Fine Arts Center Concert Hall today and tomorrow at 8 p.m. The prices for persons with student I.D.s are now $4.00, $3.75 and $3.50. Students who purchased tickets at the original price will be refunded, Union Program Council Talent Coordinator Jack Albeck said.

Campus group plans forum on library closing

The Coalition for Save The Library, a newly-formed campus group, will sponsor an open forum tomorrow at 4 p.m. in Bartlett Auditorium. The coalition consists of six University organizations: the Graduate Student Employment Union, the American Federal State County Municipal Employment, the United Staff Association, the Massachusetts Society of Professors, the Students United for Public Education and the Student Center for Education Research and Advocacy.

The forum will focus on the closing of the library, and also discussed will be the general decline of state property, particularly UMass buildings, said SCERA worker Joseph Cohen.

A UMass administrator is scheduled to appear. The audience will be given an opportunity to express their views. Coalition members said they hope to educate undergraduates, graduates, professors and UMass staffers on the University's present status. —RICK BIBEAULT

Cambodia show planned for tonight

A report and slides on Cambodia are scheduled to be presented tonight at 8 in the Hatch Cafeteria. Dr. James Matlack, former director of the Southwest Residential Area, who recently returned from a tour of Vietnam and Cambodia, will give the presentation.

The UMass Hunger Task Force, which donated last year $3,700 to OXFAM, a national relief agency, is working to raise funds to aid starving Cambodians, task force worker Pete Sabey said.

The task force hopes at least half of UMass students who eat in the dining commons to skip some meals and contribute the cost of the meals to OXFAM, Sebey said. Contributions can be given at a task force table in the Campus Center concourse each Thursday, or may be brought to 438 Student Union Building.

Polls reveal recovery for Carter's popularity

By MIKE FEINSILBER
Associated Press

In the week that his two Democratic opponents are announcing their candidacies for his office, President Carter got encouraging news from two polls indicating that his popularity is rebounding.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, DMass., led Carter 2-to-1 in a number of polls this summer, but Time magazine says a new poll narrows Kennedy's lead to 5-to-4.

Kennedy led 49 percent to 39 percent in Time's poll, conducted in late October by the research firm of Yankelovich, Skelly & White.

In Iowa, scene in January of the nation's first precinct caucuses, Carter emerged with 70.63 percent in a straw poll taken among those who attended a Democratic fund-raising dinner.

Kennedy trailed with 26.01 percent and Gov. Edmund G. Brown Jr. of California got a scant 0.82 percent.

But the Carter camp made a vigorous effort to get its supporters to the dinner and the Kennedy organization did not, according to Matt Wanning, a key Kennedy organizer.

Kennedy will formally announce his candidacy in Boston's historic Faneuil Hall tomorrow, then leave on a political tour which will take him to Manchester, N.H.; Portland, Maine; Chicago; Oklahoma City; Nashville, Tenn.; Miami; Charleston, S.C.; and Hartford, Conn., before the week is over.

Brown, who entered the primaries late in 1976 and did well against Carter, will announce his candidacy in a speech Thursday at the National Press Club in Washington, "defining the issues and outlining bold proposals to restructure the oil industry and strengthen the American economy," his headquarters said.

He will make appearances in Boston and Manchester, N.H., that night, make a speech at Yale University, his alma mater, and appearances in New York City and at Harvard University.

nite life

Neo-night fever reigns

No five-college student should be allowed to complain of boredom while living in the valley. While the valley is not as alive as a city at night, there is plenty to do if you are adventurous and energetic. Even minors — forbidden from bars since the drinking age was raised — can be entertained at night. And those without cars should not feel restricted to home.

Between Amherst, Northampton and Springfield, there is a wide selection of bars, coffeehouses, and theatres functioning daily. And the local bus system provides access to almost all.

Entertainment in the valley is inexpensive and many theatres offer discounts to students.

Following is a list of some of the theatres, bars and hang outs in the five-college area. There's something for every kind of taste...

UMass' Top of the Campus restaurant and lounge is the best on-campus get-away—stories up in the Campus Center. There students can daily enjoy exquisite dining at affordable prices. Occasionally the TOC offers entertainment—comedians, disco, bands—and is popular as a place to relax and drink. Students also find the TOC a good place for light studying or television watching. Only a TOC sticker, available at the Campus Center Information Booth—is necessary for admission. The TOC is open daily until 1 a.m. and is a good place to watch the sun go down and the lights on campus go on. Photos by Jim Mahoney.

Apocalypse:

Nearing the end of its mission, a river patrol boat enters the remote, mysterious outpost established by Col. Kurtz in "Apocalyse Now".

Robert Duvall plays the war-loving Lt. Col. Kilgore in "Apocalypse Now."

Film views human nature, not Vietnam

Francis Ford Coppola's Apocalypse Now is a three-ring circus of surrealist horror, a carnival of military mismanagement where the clown's make-up is blood.

This latest Vietnam war film is about a colonel (Marlon Brando)—a once brilliant officer who has gone mad in the Cambodian jungles and organized a small cult of soldier-followers who treat his words like messianic commands. Intelligence reports reveal the colonel's private army has carried out the killing of high-ranking South Vietnamese officials who had plotted his death. As a result the U.S. military command in Saigon orders a captain (Martin Sheen) to proceed up an enemy occupied river—via gunboat—into Cambodia to find the colonel and kill him.

The river scenes are where the majestic 70mm imagery of the film unfolds especially in the battle scene which features swooping attacks and grandiose explosions to the sound of Wagner's "Ride of the Valkeries." The ludicrous nature of the battle is accentuated when a lieutenant (Robert Duvall) orders some of his men to surf while the attack is still raging.

Apocalypse Now is more a film about a human nature than it is a war movie. The insane colonel is a genius who could not cope with an environment where there were no social mores or written laws. He lives deep in the jungle where all actions, no matter how cruel and heartless are acceptable.

The film communicates subtly and succinctly that if the military machine is going to run smoothly and efficiently, the small gears—the common soldier—must obey. These "pawns" must abandon their morals to act swiftly. The resulting inhumanity, such as seem in Auschwitz and My Lai, they feel is not their fault. Apocalypse says we need individual thought and judgement to keep the better sides of nature in power.

Acting in Apocalypse is very good. Brando, though his acting differed little from Last Tango in Paris, plays the mad colonel with an eerie power—a portrayal enhanced by both his baldness and his being veiled in shadow. Sheen plays the captain convincingly—a character who always seems on the breaking point of tenseness yet still in complete command. And Duvall was the very portrait of Pattonesque military bravado. He strides about wearing a Civil War cavalry hat as shells burst all about him, barking orders to soldiers groveling in the trenches at his feet.

Overall Apocalypse Now is an excellent film packed with awesome imagery, great acting, and provocative insights into morality and human nature.

Concerts receive top billing

For a night out in the Pioneer Valley some people like to go to movies or bars; some enjoy attending dances or plays; while some delight in putting a load on and careening down the back roads of Hadley in the car they bought with their student loan.

These are all really fun and entertaining things to do, but none as popular as concert going. And for good reason since some of the best concert performers in the country come to this area to take advantage of the superior audience quality and students' spending aptitude.

Students in general, and UMass students in particular, have great taste in music. Their fondness for good music creates a demand for live entertainment that keeps such peerless performers as Bonnie Raitt and Patti Smith returning to dip their nimble musician's fingers into the student sponsored entertainment fund.

Of course there is nothing wrong with entertainment, when it is the work of a brilliant and dedicated artist. In fact, support of these artists and their managers could be considered a truly thoughful and humanitarian act.

But the best performers, the finest musicians and most creative minds are not in the Springfield Civic Center or any of the other mass audience collection centers. The best concert entertainment is to be had right here in the five college area, given by people who love their work and an audience who appreciates it.

And besides, listening to great, original entertainment in a place that has your favorite drinks and a door to step out of, on occasion, just a hop or two away beats having some buzz-brain who's trying to get a closer look pour wine down your shirt, if you still have it after paying for your ticket.

So much for preaching. On those nights when you've finished your work, or finished caring about it, go out and enjoy yourself. But don't forget what your options are, don't overlook the best entertainment your student loan will buy.

Court action delayed in off-shore oil land sale

By FRED BAYLES
Associated Press

BOSTON — The U.S. 1st Circuit Court of Appeals delayed action yesterday until 30 minutes before the bidding starts today on an appeal to halt the sale of oil-drilling leases on the rich Georges Bank fishing grounds.

Chief Appeals Judge Frank Coffin said the two-member appeals panel hoped to rule prior to the scheduled 10 a.m. lease bidding in Provedence, R.I.

"We don't plan to let the grass grow under our feet on this matter," said Coffin. "We cannot say with any assurance when we will come to a conclusion but we hope to rule by the morning."

The appeals court set the time for its next session at 9:30 a.m.

The court delayed action after hearing arguments from atorneys seeking a restraining order against the sale in Providence of 660,000 acres of offshore leases for oil exploration.

Massachusetts Assistant Attorney General Stephen Leonard told the appeals court that U.S. District Judge John McNaught misread the law when he rejected a request for a preliminary injunction earlier in the day.

Leonard said once the lease sale took place, it represented an "irretrievable commitment of natural resources" -- in this case, the fishing grounds off New England.

Attorneys representing the U.S. Department of Interior and a consortium of oil companies said the question of offshore oil exploration still would be subject to court action even if the leases were sold today.

campus events as if they happened on campus. The story mentions the Seta Rampersad case (a UMass senior found dead in a Deerfield motel room). The article incorrectly reports "prominent members of the Amherst community" were involved, Bromery said.

"None of the people came from Amherst. They were from Northampton and Easthampton," he said.

"I told her (Marshall) most damage was done by non-students," Burke said. "She says most of the damage is done by lower classmen. That is a fallacy as far as I'm concerned," said Burke.

Marshall writes Burke said, "Most of us come up here for a good time...You know, a few beers on the weekends." She refers to him as "the tall blue-eyed junior from Southfield."

"She made it sound like I'm some kind of beer drinking derelict from South Boston. I never said most of us come here for a good time. I come here for an education," Burke said.

"The article is a gross exaggeration -- not that we don't have problems, not that we don't need better relations, not that we shouldn't be criticized. But the article was written to get into the magazine," Bromery said. "When you balance it off, it looks like we have 23,000 people who are animals.

"If she wants to sell yellow journalism, she'd do quite well," he said.

"The whole thing is misleading," Koffler said, "but this does not minimize my concern of the behavior over the weekend (Halloween)."

"A lot of problems are caused by non-students. How do you protect the university from outsiders?" Koffler asked. Of 28 people taken into protective custody Halloween weekend, five were UMass students, and 23 were non-students, Koffler said.

say about feminism? These transsexual women are being designed by medicine according to what men's ideals for women are. That the "male-to-constructed-female" sees the position of women in society as passive, non-breadwinners is an example of typical sex-role stereotyping, according to Raymond. "Feminism is dedicated to the destruction of this stereotyping," Raymond said, "

Women booters to play in EAIAW tournament

By MAUREEN SULLIVAN
Collegian Staff

UMass heads a field of eight schools participating in the EAIAW women's soccer tournament this coming Thursday through Saturday at Brown University.

The Minutewomen earned top spot with a 12-1-1 record, ending their season at Smith last Thursday with a 5-4 win. The game against New Hampshire was cancelled due to poor field conditions at Durham, on Saturday.

"The field was six inches under water," said UMass assistant coach Rick Zanini, "the conditions were pretty bad."

UMass plays a scrimmage against Westfield State College this afternoon at 3:00 p.m. The scrimmage will be played either behind Boyden or at the lower NOPE fields.

"We hope to play at Boyden," said Zanini, "and we hope people coming back from classes could stop and watch us. This team has perhaps the best record on campus; over the past two years, this soccer team has lost only one game."

Led by Karen Keough, Maddie Magnini, Nini Holstrom, Natalie Prosser, and Kelly Tuller, the Minutewomen have allowed only 16 goals while scoring 57 times. Many of UMass' wins have come against some of the participants in the Easterns—Harvard, UConn, Cortland State, and Brown. Vermont, the lone victor against UMass, is ranked third in the tournament.

"The Easterns are like the Nationals," said senior tri-captain Karen Keough, "there is no national tournament for women's soccer, but we'll be playing some good teams at Brown on Saturday."

Women spikers finish season

By MAUREEN SULLIVAN
Collegian Staff

The women's volleyball team play their final home matches tonight, when they face Keene State and Westfield State at NOPE gym, beginning at 6:00 p.m.

UMass coach Elaine Marasco said that her team was ready for tonight's matches; Sally Anderson may not play, due to an injury to her foot.

Despite a record of 17-6, UMass was not invited to the Regionals, according to Marasco.

"It was our schedule," said Marasco. "We did not have the tournament exposure some of the other teams had. We're 17-6; the other teams under consideration (there were three spots remaining on an eight-team roster) had records of 38-17, 23-19, etc. Put simply, they played in more tournaments than we did. The University has upgraded our schedule for next year; we'll be playing tourneys just about every weekend."

After Westfield and Keene, the Minutewomen travel to New Haven to face Elaine Marasco's old team, Yale University.

Instead of going to Brunswick, New Jersey, for the Rutgers Invitational, UMass will spend this coming Saturday at Clark University in Worcester for the Mass. State Championships.

Stickwomen seeded third

The women's field hockey team will enter the EAIAW Championships at Springfield College November 16-18 ranked third, behind UConn and New Hampshire.

Led by All-Americans Judy Strong and Laura O'Neil, UMass posted a 12-2 record over the regular season.

Runners 4th in Easterns; to compete in Nationals

By JAMES GRAHAM
Collegian Staff

In their biggest victory of the season the women's cross-country team finished fourth out of 70 teams in the Easterns on Sunday at Westchester, Penn., making them one of four teams in the East that will travel to Florida State on November 17 to compete in the Nationals.

The 5000 meter (3.1 mile) race, run on Westchester State's home course, was divided into three divisions with UMass running in the Championship class. In the team scoring, Penn. State came in first with 36 points, followed by Maryland with 121, Princeton with 127 and UMass with 138. UMass edged out UVM, fifth, and UNH and Brown who tied for sixth. "At two miles we were losing to UVM until there was a hill and we all passed a few runners because of our strength," Coach Pete Pfitzinger said.

Judy McCrone, 12th, was the first Minutewoman across the line with a time of 18:05. Other Minutewomen scoring points were Cathy Petrick, 23rd, Linda Welzel, 28th, Julie Burke, 36th, and Tricia Moores, 39th. The overall winner of the race was Lynn Jennings of Princeton. "Linda Welzel really clinched the meet for us and Tricia passed about eight people in the last mile. Julie Burke ran her best race of the season and probably her best race ever," Pfitzinger said.

"We all ran right to the front at the beginning because we didn't want to get boxed in," sophomore Cathy Petrick said. There were 20 teams in the Championship Division competing for the trip to Tallahassee, Florida for the Nationals. Two other divisions were introduced this year to the Easterns to accommodate smaller schools.

"The course was real tough, so the times were about 35 seconds slower than if the race was run at any of the schools we would normally race. I ran close to three miles during the race just trying to cheer on the women. I knew at the finish that we had beaten UVM but I wasn't sure if we had finished fourth," Pfitzinger said.

The Eastern Division is considered one of the toughest divisions in the nation and competition for one of the top four spots to go to the Nationals is strong. In all, 24 of the best teams will travel to the Nationals. "The Eastern Division always does well in the Nationals because of the depth and talent it has. I expect that we'll be right in the middle and finish 12th to 14th overall. I'd have to say that Princeton and UMass have the best teams of schools that don't give scholarships to women that run cross-country," Pfitzinger said.

tributed to the leadership ability of Walls. "Ever since freshman year, I realized how important it was to have a close team. I just wanted the team to be a whole. I try to make everyone feel like part of the team. I don't want the freshmen to feel like freshmen."

Walls will be graduating this spring, and is undecided about his future. His major is fisheries, but he may go into hotel management and restaurant. He does not, however, plan a career in running. He would like to possibly coach at his old high school and hopefully start a track program.

The Legal Services Office located at Room 922 Campus center has 8 openings for paralegal internships for the Spring, 1980 semester.

General Statement of Paralegal Intern Duties: Paralegals assist the attorney at the Legal Services Office with initial client interview, investigations, legal research, negotiations, giving legal advice and referral whenever necessary, preparation of court forms and attendance at hearings in the District, Superior and Probate courts of Hampshire and Franklin counties, and participation in administrative hearings and federal litigation. Other duties include the drafting of various legal documents, the writing of letters and making of phone calls on the client's behalf; the maintainance of a continuing-client case load; meeting regularly with supervising attorneys to discuss cases; the attendance at staff meetings for teachins and case strategy; and the assistance in reception duties.

Qualifications for Paralegal Intern Applicants:

1. Applicants must be full time UMass students eligiable for full-time academic credit through an academic department. Legal studies and social science majors are especially encouraged to apply.
2. Prior experience is helpful but not required.
3. A desire to learn and study the field of law.
4. An ability to work and relate well with staff and clients of the Legal services Office which serves a diversified student population.
5. The ability to work with creativity, diligence, and occasionally under high pressure.

If interseted in applying for a paralegal internship position for Spring Semester, 1980, please contact the Office of Internships at the University of Massachusetts, Curry Hicks Bldg, and inquire further at Legal Services Office, 922 Campus Center, ninth floor. Applications are due Tuesday, November 16, 1979. Interviews will begin November 20. Writing sample required.

All Third World students and women are encouraged to apply!

Express, Flakes win IM titles

By DONNA SULLIVAN
Collegian Staff

Express showed off an outstanding defense packed with interceptions and a stron defensive line in yesterday's win over Phi Sigma Kappa in men's intramural football action. The defense held the Phi Sig team to just six points while the offense racked up a total of 24.

A Phil Small interception, the first of two, set up the first Express score. Quarterback Neal Opper threw a fifteen yard touchdown pass to Bob Seltzer for an early first quarter score. Kicker Scott Yanow made it seven with a successful extra point attempt.

Phi Sigma brought it to 7-6, missing the extra point. Those were all the points they could muster as Express dominated the remainder of the football game.

Express' second score came in the third quarter with a Scott Yanow field goal good for three points.

Scott Kirkland, chalking up three interceptions on the night, combined his first with some dazzling running. With Phi Sig on Express' two yard line, Kirkland intercepted the pass in the end zone and ran the entire length of the field for an Express touchdown. Yanow made it 17-6 with the extra point, to sew up the game for Express.

The game already put away, Express continued their surge. Kirkland intercepted a pass at midfield and again exhibited some fancy football, lateraling to Yanow. The Express kicker ran in for the touchdown and made it 24 with another successful extra point attempt.

Express is a first year team and composed mostly of seniors. In addition to quarterback and team captain Neal Opper, Small, Kirkland, Yanow, and Seltzer, team members include Russell Opper, Mike Yanow, Tom Grimes, Joe Lambert, Peter Leahey, and Marc Brown.

The team went 10 wins and no losses in their first year of play, going 5-0 in regular season play and 5-0 in the playoffs.

They advanced to the finals after a close win over the Hamilin Howlers in last Thursday's semi-final action.

Most of the Express team members are veterans of high school football competition although quarterback and team captain Opper was a soccer player.

In women's football finals action, the Pumas and Flakes lived up to the expectations of a most exciting match. The running grudge match saw the Flakes victorious this year with a touchdown in the final two minutes of play.

After a totally scoreless duel, Sue Henry, quarterback for the Flakes, finished a drive with a touchdown pass to Laura O'Neil.

The Pumas had their last chance to retaliate crushed when O'Neil intercepted a Puma pass well into Flakes territory.

The Flakes suffered just one loss all season, at the hands of the Pumas in regular season play. "We lost to them 6-0 in the regular season so we really wanted to win tonight," said Fran Cornacchioli.

According to Flakes coach Cari Nickerson, the Flakes lost in the finals last year and won the title the year before. "It was a well fought battle," said Cornacchioli.

The Pumas were hindered by an injury late in the first half, losing a key line person.

According to Pumas Fian Nooijen, "They threatened a lot and we held them. It was just one too many."

The Flakes advanced to the finals after a 22-2 victory over the Indians in semi-final action.

Rick Walls sets the pace

By JANE WOLFSON
Collegian Staff

To a good deal of people on campus, the name Rick Walls is an unfamiliar one. But to the men's cross country team, the name and the man represent leadership, dedication, as well as a captain who must be given much of the credit for the young team's achievements of this season.

Women harriers in Nationals. Page 19.

Walls, a senior, began running cross country during his junior year at Lee High School in Lee, Mass.

"I decided to give running a try mostly because I was sitting on the bench with other sports," explains Walls. "I made varsity first year out, but because there is no track program at my high school I was running only three months out of the year."

His senior year at Lee, he was co-captain of the team, and placed second in the Western Mass Meet, and sixth in the Berkshire County Meet. That fall also brought a letter from UMass cross country and track coach Ken O'Brien.

"I was almost sure that I wanted to come here and after I talked to Coach I knew his program would be good for me," said Walls.

"Coach (O'Brien) has no scholarships to work with, so when he recruits, he picks runners that are not visably outstanding. His program is geared to hidden potential. I don't think I could have found a better program for me."

Walls has been running varsity for the past three years. "Rick is the kind of performer who responds to the challenge," said O'Brien. "He's very versatile, that's why he makes such a good leader and a good team captain."

"Rick is a good influence on us," says teamate Jerry Pratt. "He leads through example and through his leadership qualities he's a motivator. He keeps the team loose, he's an excellent person, an individual."

This season Walls and sophomore Paul Beaulieu have been the team's mainstays. As the team has been plagued by inconsistency, these two have run steadily, setting the pace.

"It's been a long season and Rick's kept everyone going," adds fellow runner Mike Doiron. "Even when we weren't doing well he was still putting the time and effort into every practice and workout."

For Walls, running is not only a sport, it is a way of life. He runs about 70 miles a week.

"To run 10 or 12 miles isn't hard," Walls insists. "It may be difficult for the initial period, but I can run 8 to 14 miles and its enjoyment. There is no mental or physical strain."

UMass cross country runners are all three-sport athletes. After cross country is over they go directly to indoor and then outdoor track. There is no break, just continual running all year round. But Walls does not find that detracting to his studies.

"Running helps school in the sense that it does not take away from studying. It's never a chore to go to the lockeroom."

The cross country team as a whole is a very close knit group. This must be at-

Item: No one drafts the Boomer

I mean who are these guys trying to kid?

Did anyone really think the Jesus Alous of the 1979 Free Agency Freak Show would even be signed, much less drafted. I'll bet even Jesus himself didn't think so. So why did he, like the hoardes of Kessingers, Kaats, Blairs, Boomers, and a cast of thousands (even Glenn Borgman -- the reincarnation of George Mitterwald, Phil Roof, Jerry Zimmerman...) even bother to declare?

The answers are unclear, but can be narrowed down to either one of three reasons: A) They like to see their names in agate type in papers like The Middlesex News, or 2) they knew their own teams were drafting a tank upstairs, i.e. Rudy May, and wanted to protect what little foothold in the majors they had, or C) they had it on good sources that they would be signed by the Red Sox. Take your pick.

But, once again, George Steinbrenner ate everyone's thunder, at least for the time being, nabbing Rupe Jones, Rick Cerone, and Tom Underwood in the space of 24 hours. Although the Chambliss trade is meeting with some sore feelings in New York, the Yankee organization, like the old Branch Rickey Dodgers, have an eerie talent for trading a player with one good season left and obtaining a lot of good youngsters in return. Witness Danny Cater, Fritz Peterson, Pat Dobson...

Item: Ed "Too Tall" Jones makes boxing debut

Now that the single greatest gate attraction in the history of boxing, if not the history of sport is gone for good, the heavyweight promoters and television geeks have pulled out all stops so boxing won't return to the position it was in during the pre-Ali era.

Anything, KGB Chickens, tag-teams, celebrity boxing, you name it. Ali is a difficult act to follow, you know.

It might be a good idea to leave boxing to real live boxers. The recent "Too Tall" debacle proved that it takes a bit more, believe it or not, than sheer strength to be a first-rate boxer. And it takes some ring smarts, which Jones doesn't have, in order to keep yourself from getting knocked into next Thursday.

But Jones, lacking these qualities, was on the CBS Sports Spectacle, and by God, the CBS people don't give a guy valuable air time just so he can lose, even though an unknown Mexican boxer floored the big fella. Don't forget, these are the same people who brought you Heavyweight Champion of the World Leon Spinks.

Maybe Jones, the recently retired Ernie Holmes, and the recently unretired Lyle Alzado should become professional wrestlers. That way they could have all the fun of CBS Sports Spectacular and not get hurt at the same time. Ask Ernie Ladd.

For in the early 1970s Wilt Chamberlain attempted to arrange a heavyweight fight with Muhammad Ali. However, Wilt's people wisely talked him out of it. Ali said, while he couldn't reach the Stilt's head, he'd simply break every rib in his body.

Ed Jones should get out of boxing before he actually has to meet a halfway decent fighter. He could get hurt doing things like that, for heavens sake!

Item: Brent strikes again

When will Brent Musberger learn that the team that has the most points on the scoreboard at the end of the game is usually the winner. If you get your sports news exclusively from Brent, well, consider yourself ready for an all-expense-paid-trip to the Booby Hatch.

Just last Sunday at the end of the Dallas-Giants game Brent said: "Tom Landry (coach of Dallas) was very gratious in defeat in a game he said the Giants deserved to win. But the Cowboys pulled it out..." I always thought to be gratious in defeat one had to be defeated.

Or how about the time he reported that the Orioles won the World Series in five games with a 1-0 victory over the Bucs.

Trouble is, though, that Musberger at one time was respected as a good sportswriter when he worked in Chicago. Then he got to CBS and was put with the Phyllis Georges, Hayne Kennedys and Jimmy the Geeks...Poor fellow, he deserves one's sympathy.

Koffler airs security plans

By JENNIFER YODER
Collegian Staff

In a Whitmore press conference last night, UMass Chancellor Henry Koffler and Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs Dennis L. Madson announced a new 1:00 a.m. curfew to be imposed immediately on non-students, and pledged to increase lighting in high priority areas.

Koffler said anyone with "no legitimate purpose", who is neither a member of the UMass community nor the guest of a student, will be asked to leave immediately after 1:00 a.m.

Koffler said the university seeks to limit outsiders without violating their rights to use a public university, and enforce existing security rules more vigorously.

The new security policies came one day after a request by UMass President David C. Knapp that the Amherst campus take steps to avoid damage and violence similar to that which occurred on the recent Halloween weekend. "They will have my full and complete support in the measures they propose to take," Knapp said of Koffler's staff.

In addition to the so-called "visitor's policy" curfew, the police will patrol campus areas which are most attractive to outsiders.

In the dormitories, a new "guest policy" is expected to take effect immediately as a reaction to increased vandalism committed by guests. The policy requires all residence halls to be locked at night, with access limited to residents of the hall only. The students will be expected to be responsible for their guests, Koffler added.

In addition, the hours during which campus buildings are open to the public will be posted, Koffler said.

The issue of lack of campus lighting dominated last night's meeting. Madson said there are plans to install additional lighting along sidewalks leading from residential areas to the library. In spite of this issue being "top priority", however, the budget is still tight, Koffler said, but he could offer no estimate as to when the lighting will be installed or where the money will come from.

According to Madson, improved police coverage has also been initiated due to increased vandalism and violence. Director of Security Gerald O'Neil has assigned ten additional officers to patrol campus trouble spots during the peak time on weekends, Madson said.

"These officers have the specific charge of enforcing the new Visitors Policy," Madson said. "Although the assignment of these additional personnel represents a substantial drain on the Public Safety budget, there is wide agreement that the new policies cannot successfully be implemented without increased police response," he said.

Addressing alcohol consumption on campus and its effect on vandalism, Madson said no solution has been found.

"Since most of our students are under age, they have been forced from outside to inside facilities. Alcohol at parties is a violation of the law and the university must uphold the law," he said.

Koffler said after an arrest, the court determines the punishment, but there will also be an attempt by the university to keep an eye on students who are arrested in order to see if there is a repeated problem. If so, the University will take disciplinary action, he saida.

Koffler emphasized the need for input from the residential area government people and Student Government Association leadership.

"There is a need for good personal relationships between students and faculty," he said.

Koffler said a letter from Madson will be delivered to all on-campus residents, informing them of the new visitors and guest policies, and announcing increased enforcement of behavioral standards.

'SWAT' team annoys SW residents

By ED LEVINE
Collegian Staff

Residents and staff in Southwest Residential Area expressed outrage yesterday over campus police activity there this past weekend.

According to observers, police were patrolling both the grounds and buildings of the area in groups and some students reported their rooms were entered by officers who identified themselves as the "SWAT Team."

Phil Ricci, head of residence in Washington Tower Middle, said he spoke to UMass police Sergeant Michael R. Grabiec in his dorm Friday evening. He said Grabiec told him orders to tighten up security in Southwest came from University Chancellor Henry Koffler who had received a directive from Gov. Edward King.

Ricci quoted Grabiec as saying, "we're here to take the campus away from the animals and give it back to the students."

When contacted yesterday, UMass police refused to comment on the situation, although they said a meeting would be held at 3:30 this afternoon at police headquarters in Dickinson Hall between Southwest residents and Public Safety Director Gerald T. O'Neil.

Ricci said he was first informed of the police presence in the building by residents on the 15th floor who complained their room had been entered by several officers. He said the students reported the police had confiscated several street signs and a marijuana plant from one room.

He said the police had left the building after he had spoken to Graibec, but had returned later in the evening.

Related story, p. 3

"They assumed there was trouble here," he said, "but there was no trouble except that being caused by the police."

Students said the police were from both Amherst and Worcester campuses.

Chris Hodgekins, a residential assistant in Coolidge, said the police were "making more noise than the students." He said the police had entered a woman's room, two doors down from his, and claiming they had complaints about a loud stereo, had the residents turn the music off.

"They claimed they had been called," he said, "but I expect that's just an excuse for harassment."

Hodgekins said when he confronted the officers he did not "get a straight answer from them. They sarcastically described their actions as a 'friendly walk through the neighborhood'."

Another residential assistant in Southwest, Michael Niden, said when he asked a group of officers he saw in the area Saturday night what the trouble was, one officer replied, "How would you like to spend the night on a cold steel bed?" and then suggested that we "had better get inside the building."

Niden also reported excessive noise by the police. "They weren't just testing the lounge doors quietly," he said, "they were slamming them. They sounded like a frat group going through the dorm." Niden also said the officers had referred to themselves as the "SWAT team."

Other students also reported being harassed by police officers. According to several Southwest residents, the police had requested identification from many students, regardless of whether they possessed alcohol. Groups of students in closed rooms were reported to have been dispersed by the officers, who had also closed down a party in John Adams dormitory, students said.

No racism in Cuba, Pedro Rodriguez says

By MARCIA HOSPEDALES
Black Affairs Staff

"The problem of racism was easily eradicated in Cuba because it was an artificial problem created by the ruling system," Cuban activist and scholar Pedro Rodriguez told a capacity Campus Center audience last night.

Rodriguez spoke through an interpreter, Amareles Gonzalez of Cuba.

According to Rodriguez the problem of racial discrimination has been eliminated in Cuba.

"At present Cuban society is an integrated one. Job opportunities are determined by ablity and merit and never the color of one's skin," he said in a lecture which focused on the history of the black experience in Cuba.

Rodriguez stated that Cuba is a multi-racial country with blacks making up the majority of the population. "The black problem in Cuba dates back to when the country was discovered by Columbus and was colonized. Race was once important in the past but not now," he said.

From the beginning of Cuban history, blacks have always had an important role in the struggle for Cuban independence.

According to Rodriguez, the underground movement which undermined former Cuban dictator Fulgencio Batista was formed by people of all color and this paved the way for the triumph of the revolution.

"Two months after the triumph of the revolution Fidel proclaimed a struggle against discrimination," he said.

Before the revolution Cuba had a large unemployment rate, the majority of which was black. This was a result of racial discrimination and a high rate of unskilled labor among blacks, Rodriguez said.

'Two months after the triumph of the revolution Fidel proclaimed a struggle against discrimination'

The revolution gave them the right to work in all skills and professions with equal wage for equal work, he continued.

Rodriguez went on to explain that there were also class divisions in housing. The revolution eliminated black ghettoes and moved families into new apartment houses, he said.

The lecture was sponsored by the Distinguished Visitors Program, Ahora, Afrik-Am Society, Office of Third World Affairs, Commuter Collective and the Venceremos Brigade.

Korean CIA chief killed Park

SEOUL(AP)– South Korea's powerful intelligence chief assassinated President Park Chung-hee Oct. 26 without military or foreign help in a miscalculated attempt to install himself as president, according to the final report on the investigation issued yesterday.

The plot is spiced with mysterious women and a misfired gun, but the report places the blame for Park's death entirely on KCIA chief Kim Jae-kyu, a close adviser to the president.

"He had the illusion he was best-suited for president," the report said. "He miscalculated that he could exercise influence over key leaders in the government and military."

Khomeini rejects hostage appeal

By The Associated Press

Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini yesterday rejected appeals that Iranian students should end their three-day occupation of the U.S. embassy in Tehran. He also warned of further antiAmerican action if the shah is not returned to face trial.

The Tehran student demonstrators threatened to execute about 60 Americans being held hostage if the United States tries a military rescue operation.

The Carter administration said it will not return the shah nor would it use force to free the Americans. The administration said it expected protection for the hostages from the anti-American Revolutionary Council that Khomeini ordered to run the country after Prime Minister Mehdi Bazargan resigned.

Teddy ready for 1980 bid

BOSTON(AP)– Sen. Edward M. Kennedy straps on the mantle of his political legacy today with a morning news conference at Faneuil Hall to announce his candidacy for the Democratic presidential nomination.

It is 19 years to the day since his late brother, John F. Kennedy, made his last presidential campaign speech from the same spot.

Formation of a Kennedy for President Committee late last month made the senator a candidate under federal election laws.

But his scheduled 10:30 a.m. announcement put the Kennedy hat officially in the ring and made him the third member of his illustrious political clan to seek the nation's highest office.

Kennedy's challenge to President Carter capped a herky-jerky scenario which began with rumors he would be a candidate. It progressed to hints by Kennedy that he would in fact run and formation of draft-Kennedy committees in several states.

Kennedy claimed he had no control over those spirited volunteers.

NE oil drilling leases blocked

WASHINGTON(AP)– Supreme Court Justice William J. Brennan Jr. yesterday blocked the sale of oil-drilling leases in the Georges Bank, a major Atlantic Ocean fishing ground off New England's coast.

Brennan, acting on an emergency request to postpone the opening of bids for the offshore oil-drilling rights, said no bid should be opened until further word from him or the full Supreme Court.

Court sources said Brennan had referred the matter to his eight fellow justices and that it would be discussed in Friday's regularly scheduled conference.

Brennan's action apparently invalidated the bids that were to be opened by midnight yesterday since by Friday the bids will technically no longer exist.

White wins fourth term

By STEVEN A. COHEN
Associated Press

BOSTON – Kevin H. White won re-election to an unprecedented fourth four-year term as mayor of this racially troubled city yesterday, defeating state Sen. Joseph F. Timilty in Timilty's third attempt to knock White out of office.

With 89 percent of the city's 252 precincts reporting, White held a commanding lead of 67,265 to 55,763 in unofficial returns. That gave White a margin of 55 percent to 45 percent.

Stephen Crosby, White's campaign manager, said 1¼ hours after the polls closed that, "We didn't do badly anyplace. It looks like we've won at least 16 of 22 wards."

White did well, as he has in the past, in the black neighborhoods and in the predominantly Irish-American South Boston section, the focal point of much of the city's racial strife.

The unofficial count showed White with a better margin of victory than the last time the two were paired, in the 1975 mayoralty election. That was a much more bitter contest

Both candidates ran campaigns which skirted the nagging racial tensions that have plagued New England's largest city since the federal courts ordered Boston's schools desegregated in 1973.

They focused instead on the standard urban issues: property taxes, jobs, housing, development and crime, and neither won the endorsement of the city's black leadership, which viewed race relations as the principal issue.

A black candidate, state Rep. Mel King, came in third, behind Timilty, in September's preliminary runoff election.

White and Timilty were paired against each other for a second time in yesterday's election in this city of 650,000. Polls were open from 8 a.m. to 8 p.m.

Also on the Boston ballot were candidates for city council and school committee, and municipal elections were being held throughout Massachusetts.

White, 49, was first elected mayor in 1967. Timilty, 40, a state senator for seven years, is a former Boston city councilor and was running his third campaign for mayor.

White beat Timilty by a 6 percent margin in 1975. Timilty failed to make it past the September preliminary runoff four years earlier.

The candidates said little about the continuing racial tensions in the schools which flared into violence in the midst of the campaign.

White had the endorsement of the city's two major newspapers, and he went into the election leading in the polls.

But Timilty accused White of creating a political machine and focusing too much attention on the downtown business district at the expense of the neighborhoods. He hammered repeatedly at White's refusal to lower the property tax rate despite significant increases in state aid.

Despite persistent demands by Timilty, White avoided a debate with his challenger. He raised some $1.2 million for reelection, relied heavily on an expensive media campaign and emphasized his experience, urban development and the quality of life in Boston.

Non-students face new UM 1 a.m. curfew

By LISA CAPONE
and NORM WHITEHURST
Collegian Staff

Recent security problems plaguing the University are currently being addressed by the Office of Planning and the Office of Residential Resources, both of which have proposed plans to step up security on campus.

In a Residential Resources meeting yesterday, Director of Health Services Barry Averill outlined a plan which sets a campus curfew of 1 a.m., effective immediately for non-UMass students.

Under the plan, police will ask anyone on campus after 1 a.m. for a UMass I.D., and those students who refuse will be subject to a $25 fine.

To increase dormitory security, Averill said, a policy to keep uninvited guests out of the dorms is now being planned. He also expressed concern over frequent false fire alarms and vandalism in the dorms. Averill said a letter from his office is being sent to dorm residents warning them of the dangers of false fire alarms.

Director of Residential Life Marjorie Lenn yesterday called for the activation of the University Discipline Board, a faculty-student group which determines grounds for student expulsions. Lenn also said she supports the implementation of a teach-in method, in which professors would give their philosophies on disciplinary actions.

A proposal to increase lighting and security measures is also under consideration by the Office of Planning, according to Director Jack Littlefield.

"The basic idea is to develop certain walkways on campus for improved lighting of it's required and increased security controls, with the assumption that students will use these walkways," Littlefield said.

Campus areas will be divided into two categories, according to how frequently students use them, he said. Major student areas, which Littlefield said include the areas around the Student Union Building, Campus Center, and the Fine Arts Center, and pathways leading to and from dormitories, will be foot-patroled until until 2 a.m. Areas in and around other campus buildings will be patroled until 10 p.m., according to Littlefield, but he said the office hopes students will use the high demand corridors.

Funding for this lighting project cannot be determined until a lighting survey, now in the planning stages, has been completed by his office, Littlefield said. He said that lighting experts from General Electric have indicated their willingness to volunteer for consultation and planning of the project.

Vice-Chancellor of Student Affairs Dennis Madson said yesterday he thinks the plan is well-designed, and the administration must make efforts to re-divert money towards safety projects, because "safety problems must be our highest priorities."

Both Littlefield and Madson cited ongoing campus maintenance problems as the reason why little has been done to improve lighting on campus since June 1979, when the Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy published a survey exposing inadequate lighting in many areas on campus.

Madson said there are "clearly some problems" with lighting on campus. Asked why little has been done to alleviate these problems, he said, "The most obvious is resources. We have more projects than we have money."

Mother Goose and disco

'The Babes' — slick and funny

By JULIE EAGLE
Collegian Staff

Mother Goose tales bring comforting images of our past to mind: endless story hours, sipping cocoa on mother's lap in the family nursery.

Disco: the music of our present. Hip, funky, fast. The beat that rings of the 70's.

These two starkly opposite genres were magically melded together last night in a colorful, highly entertaining production of "The Babes in Toyland." The Fine Arts Center audience of about 500 laughed, clapped and snapped fingers as favorite fairy tale characters were brought to life in the two-hour rock/disco musical.

The play, like disco, was fast-paced. But like the Mother Goose characters of yesterday, it was also warm and nostalgic – anything but plastic.

The plot centers around The Babes (Mark Holleran, Roger Lawson and Michael Calkins), an unemployed, but highly talented singing group, which arrives in Toyland, Inc., a rundown amusement park. On their way to Nashville in search of fame, The Babes land in Toyland after running out of gas.

Fuel The Babes do not get, but high adventure is theirs as they remain at Toyland and aim to revive the place. The task proves challenging however, as they try to help a toymaker (Ken Bonafons) and his granddaughter Mary (Debbie McLeod), battle the slumlord of Toyland, Barnaby (C.A. Hutton).

The acting is excellent and the dancing is overwhelming. Holleran, Lawson and Calkins are convincing as three young, slick would-be song artists. Lawson, as Horace, is the hippest of the three. In one hilarious scene, Horace says to Mother Goose (S. Barkley Murray), "Excuse me, Mama, but I have been digging your work for a long time and to meet you in person really blows me away."

Horace slaps Mother Goose five.

Holleran and Calkins are also superb as the respective suitors of Mary and Little Bo Peep (Shari Watson). Watson is hilarious as an updated Bo with a thick, Brooklyn whine, which at one point she uses to ask Mary, "Hey Mar', have you seen my sheep?"

Bonafons, McLeod, Hutton, Murray and the cast of Mother Goose characters are equally funny and convincing.

Calkins steals the show with his extraordinary dancing, as does Barnaby's computer, a wry talking machine named Bob.

Produced by Fran and Barry Weissler, "The Babes in Toyland" was originally written and produced at the turn of the century by Victor Herbrt. This newest version was written by the obviously gifted Ellis Weiner, a former National Lampoon editor, and choreographed by Tony Stevens.

The play will be showing in a final performance tonight in the Fine Arts Center Concert Hall at 8. Student ticket prices are $4, $3.75 and $3.50.

Black Affairs

'Asians blast cultural director'

We the Asian American Students Association (AASA) are severely disturbed and angry with the current situation in the New Africa House. Three weeks ago it was discovered that all of our equipment and materials were removed from our office in the New Africa House. We had received no notice of this removal and were very confused as to why they were removed and to where.

The next week Michael Suzuki talked with Tony Crayton the director of Third World Affairs about the situation and he advised us to write a letter to the New Africa House Steering Committee (NAHSC) inquiring about our office and supplies. That letter was then received and discussed at the NAHSC meeting on Oct. 25, 1979 at the New Africa House. Present at that meeting were the Asian American Students Assoc., AHORA, Afrikan American, Third World Affairs, Nummo News, various other Third World organizations, and Mr. Van Jackson, 'director' of the Black Cultural Center.

The meeting began with Tony Crayton reading our letter to the NAHSC after which Mr. Jackson responded that it was he and the custodians who removed the equipment, but only across the hall. He was then asked about who made the decision to remove the materials, to which he replied that "we" did. He was then asked who "we" was. He said that "we" was himself and the custodians. It is obvious from his insistance on "we" that Mr. Jackson was the person who made the decision. After all the custodians have very little decision making power and if Mr. Jackson takes decisions from them, then I would also suggest that Mr. Jackson is incompetant as a director of anything. Not to suggest that the custodians are stupid, but they are not the people I would go to in search of advice or the main people I would consult on decisions such as the removal of an entire organization from their office.

As the meeting continued it was revealed that Mr. Jackson had removed us from our office because we had another in the Student Union. This was done without consulting or even notifying AASA on the situation. He said he had tried to notify us but couldn't get hold of us. He said he tried to get an address for our association and its officers from Tony Crayton, who at the meeting rebuked that saying that Mr. Jackson had only asked for a treasurer's list. And even if Tony Crayton didn't give him the list it would have been perfectly easy to contact RSO who's files are public record, Valerie Nii who works with CCEBS in the New Africa House, or at least leave a message in the AASA mailbox which would be impossible not to find.

That he didn't do any of the above, suggests one of two things: first, that he is incredibly incompetant, or second and most likely that he knew that his actions were wrong and if the Asian Students found out about this or if Third World got wind of it, he would be in severe trouble. So he quietly removed AASA materials with the help of the custodians, but it was a rather stupid move considering that sooner or later AASA was going to come back to the office and find their things missing.

At any rate, after this was revealed the AASA representative at the meeting asked Mr. Jackson to show her where our things were, which Mr. Jackson agreed to. She was then shown a storage closet which when opened had in it materials strewn in haphazard fashion, not to mention that some of our materials were missing or replaced with obviously second class material. At this point our AASA representative was very angry but the subject had to be tabled because of time limitations.

That brings us to the current situation. Last week as many of you know, the NAHSC meeting on Thursday Nov. 1, 1979 was cancelled. A notice placed in Black Affairs in the Collegian on Oct. 31, 1979 made a note of that. This week on November 5, 1979 AASA and Third World Affairs received a letter saying in effect that there was a meeting of the NAHSC on November 1, 1979 during which Dian John was unanimously elected chairperson of the NAHSC. The letter was not signed.

Obviously this meeting cannot be recognized by Third World organizations. For one thing this meeting should have never taken place. For another none of the major groups that represent Third World were there. Those not present were: AASA, Afrikan-American Society, AHORA, Drum, Nummo News, BMCP, Third World Affairs, and all the Third World culture centers on campus.

Thus, we have a meeting that shouldn't have taken place at all, and did not represent Third World. These are not the only reasons that this meeting should not be recognized though. Another reason is that the letter of the meeting is most likely fabricated. Talking to Ms. Carol Carter from CCEBS, we have found out that CCEBS gave no authorization for such an action or vote to any CCEBS representative, and talking with Afrikan American we have found out that they did not even recognize the NAHSC as it stands. Thus, there could have been no vote from Afrik-Am or CCEBS, the only two groups of any great significance to the Third World that were supposed to have been there according to the letter. Thus, the credibility of the entire letter must be deemed suspect.

Thus far I have listed all those moves which Mr. Van Jackson has taken against AASA, which were acts completely unfounded and which revealed Mr. Jackson's "White" mentality. I have not included the many other moves he has made against his own Black brothers and sisters for I have not been personally involved with these. But I can assure you that they have happened and will continue until Mr. Jackson is removed from his position at the Cultural Center. Thus, I urge all of the Third World community to come to the NAHSC meeting at 4:00 p.m. sharp on Thursday Nov. 8, 1979 at the New Africa House, so we can finally be rid of this parasite who preys on his own in search of personal power.

'Meeting invalid'

Apparently there has been a mixup of communications concerning the New Africa House Steering Committee scherduled this Thursday in New Africa House at 4 p.m. The first formal meeting was called by the former chairman, Mark Hickson on October 22 in a descriptive article on the historical background of the Steering Committee.

It took place with present members of BMCP, Afrik-Am, Malcolm X Center, Asian-American Students Association, Black Affairs Staff and other interested students, in the Black Cultural Center with the Director Van Johnson present.

The discussion centered around the need for a new constitution and a cleaner identification of the role and governance policies of the committee. Community problems were also discussed around the loss of Asian-American Students Association's office in New Africa House, the disputes with the Collegian and Nummo News, WMUA and BMCP and the conditions of racism and sexism against Third World women.

The meeting ended without an agreed upon date. The office of Third World Affairs contacted members of Afrik-Am, Ahora, Asian-American Association, BMCP, Malcolm X Center and Nummo News and they preferred to meet this Thursday, Nov. 8. Since there was no agreed upon date and Black Affairs mistakenly reported that it would be Nov. 1 a correction ran on Oct. 31 informing groups of the agreed date.

It was later found that despite the correction and even though no Third World student organizations got any formal notice a meeting was held without any of the major groups notified or present. On Nov. 5, several, not all Third World organizations were notified that there was an election of the chairperson by a "unanimous vote" annd the meeting times were also changed.

Many groups were dissatisfied because the meeting was not held with their knowledge and major changes were made without their consideration. The organizations who were listed as attending reportedly did not attend because of prior notification but merely because they happened by chance to be in the building at the time.

Apparently communications became mixed and since none of the persons listed were "designated" or "elected" by their organizations to represent them it would necessitate that any decisions be considered void. Hopefully the entire matter of the Steering Committee's composition, construction and goals can be finally resolved Thursday Nov. 8 at 4 p.m. All Third World organizations are requested to have members present to have maximum representation of al groups and their views.

Cambodians need support

James Lewis

On Nov. 15, OXFAM will sponsor its annual UMass fast. This year, the money will go to aid the Cambodians who are dying by the thousands.

Cambodia has a population estimated between four and five million people. The news reports were false in saying that two million Cambodians will die this fall. The fact is, two million Cambodians have already died.

Eighty-five percent of the population is experiencing starvation.

According to the United Nations, the minimal food needed for Cambodia is estimated here as 165,000 tons during the next six months. Right now, 15 tons are being brought to Phnom Penh on a daily flight.

Secretary of State Cyrus Vance pledged on Tuesday that the United States donate $69 million to the Cambodian people, saying they are "on the verge of extinction."

The Soviet Union, meanwhile, promised the Cambodians $85 million in assistance.

UN officials claim that OXFAM relief supplies are coming in, (right now, two barges carrying 3,500 tons of rice), and Soviet and eastern European assistance is also being distributed.

The famine is due to the failure of the rice crops in Cambodia.

The United States is responsible for the famine. Under Nixon's "Vietnamization" program, the US launched bombing raids, as well as chemical warfare plans designed to destroy the vegetation in Vietnam, with Nixon's illegal, secret invasion into Cambodia in March, 1970. The invasion into Vietnam was supposed to kill the Vietnamese.

Under the Vietnamese plan, the US was supposed to withdraw with honor from the Vietnam war. As the troops were being pulled out, the bombings, the napalming, the agent orange defoliation began—and the Cambodians are currently suffering the effects.

The irony of Cambodia is that the country was a neutral country, claiming neutrality throughout the war.

The annual fast day is to all UMass students a chance to donate their meals for that day to be converted into money to be sent to Cambodia. Last year, UMass only donated $900, which is miniscule, considering the school has 24,000 students.

Students can turn in their Dining Commons meal tickets Nov. 13 and 14 if they wish to contribute to OXFAM. The more students who participate in this, the more Cambodian lives will be saved.

This is the least we can do, considering we allow our country to devastate that country.

The days for giving are Nov. 13 and 14. The day of fast and sacrifice is Nov. 15. I do hope students patronize this. It would show at least part of the American people.

'Nazism' on this campus?

Bill Sundstrom

Nazism is no joke, but to read the Collegian editorial pages one would think it has become one on this campus. Every other week or so another exposition of rather crude anti-Semitism graces the pages, to be followed within a day or so by the obligatory Zionist rejoinder.

Unforunately, this pattern has the effect of blunting the community's sensitivity to a very serious trend at UMass and all over the world. Nazism and fascism are on the upswing again.

Nazism is a complicated and narrowly defined movement, so it isn't surprising that many people are inclined to believe it died with Hitler. But propaganda like the mimeo, "Masters of the Media," handed out on this campus the past few weeks, contains all the ingredients of Nazism no less insiduous than the German variety.

The basic appeal of Nazism and fascism is to a rather diverse cross-section of society that rightfully feels it has been victimized. The idea is to expound a nationalistic "socialism" and to blame the nation's woes on a scapegoat; in the case of Nazism, on the Jews. Everybody learns that definition in high school.

Now examine "Masters of the Media," circulated by a nebulous group called the Iranian Moslem Students. Typically, it couches anti-Semitism in socialistic rhetoric, blaming the "mercantile" Jews for the media monopolies, and citing the Jews' "uncanny instinct for power." Then it speaks of the present decadence and the need for "national regeneration." Of the alleged Jewish control over the media, "There is nothing more dangerous to the future of our people." That is, us against them, you see.

This is not, as the Iranian Moslem Students would have us believe, a question of the "facts." Whether or not the facts are as the pamphlet claims, facts mean nothing without a framework of ideas in which they are placed. The framework here is Nazism, pure and simple.

Fortunately, the Iranian Moslem Students are not nearly such talented propagandists as Hitler and his cronies. But that this material has surfaced in such a shameless fashion on this campus is cause for serious concern.

An anti-Semitism of a more subtle, less systematic sort has also occasioned the Collegian, fueling the fire of racial hatred and misunderstanding. In the case of columnist James Lewis (see, "Jewish race should learn," 10/31), I'm sure his intentions are only the best. He is not a Nazi. But his technique is careless and dangerous.

Some people feel obligated to shed light on the rift between Jews and Third World people, but in many cases they merely cast a deeper shadow. The confusion in James Lewis' case, a confusion common to both sides of this debate, is between Judaism as a race and the national policies of the U.S. and Israel.

Lewis' big revelation is that Israel offers significant ammounts of aid to racist South Africa, and that the U.S., theoretically under pressure by powerful Jews, sends significant amounts of aid to Israel. I won't deny either. From there Lewis insinuates a connection between the Jewish race and national policies that support racist regimes, but nowhere does he spell it out.

In the guise of analysis, Lewis has inspired further hostility between Blacks and Jews. That is really ironic and sad, because when the Nazis march down North Pleasant Street—and don't believe it couldn't happen—they'll be goose-stepping side by side with the Klan.

Nazism is a reality in our society. As you watch our culture decay and our economy deteriorate, you can see sentiments developing in ordinary people that could find their expression in Nazism.

I hope I haven't overstated my case. As a socialist, an atheist, and an often vehement anti-Zionist, I'm not bothered a bit by well-reasoned attacks on Zionist imperialism. Irrational attacks on the Jewish people scare me to death.

UMass professor says Collegian irresponsible

I would like to see the Collegian to become a responsible paper. To move in this direction it must follow the time-tested policies of a responsible and free press. It should concentrate on news, confining editorial opinion, letters, and special pleading to only a couple of designated pages. It should not have sections devoted to special interest "news," whether such pages be part of the paper or inserts. If Albert Shanker or Mobil Corp. want to present their versions of the news, they pay for the space and it is labelled "advertisement."

If the Collegian continues to donate or allow designated pages or inserts for, say, Women or Black or Third World "news," then it should do the same for, say, the Right to Life Movement, anti-busing groups, and Lebanese Christians. The Collegian can and should be a free and independent newspaper, not a garbage can for those special interests which, by their stridency and their threats, have made it loaded and lopsided. The alternative—to donate space to all special interest groups who might want to air their views—would result in a paper so thick that the Sunday New York Times would look like a throwaway.

I therefore urge the editors of the Collegian to stop behaving like jellyfish. Let them stand up and be counted. After all, the "free" in free press does not mean giving away your responsibilities as journalists.

Many Southwest residents expressed anger over the police actions this weekend. "This is my home, I don't have to be subjected to this harassment," said Randy Chapman, a resident of Washington dormitory. "Nobody wants the police here," he said, "It's just creating conflict and tensions."

Hodgekins echoed Chapman's sentiments. "The cops have no right to walk into rooms," he said. "Having them here is humiliating and degrading." He said he had spoken to O'Neil over the weekend, who had denied knowledge of the police activity during the weekend. "I think it was only a certain few," Hodgekins said. "One officer harassed me and tried to intimidate me, but two others just ignored him."

Voters decide propositions

Associated Press

Voters across the nation decided a variety of propositions, including Proposition 13-style spending limits in three states, bottle laws in three others, and rent control measures in San Francisco and Baltimore.

Early returns in Ohio showed that a proposition that would require a 10-cent deposit on beverage containers to curb litter was being soundly defeated.

With 3,239 of 13,262 polling places reporting, the vote was 469,096 against the proposal and 170,936 in favor.

In Maine, however, a measure that would have repealed a bottle law in effect since 1978 was losing overwhelmingly.

With 36.2 percent of the precincts reporting, Maine residents voted 36,425 to 4,995 to retain the 22-month-old bottle law.

Washington voters were also considering a proposal to mandate deposits on beverage containers. The bottle bill contests in all three states drew heavy last-minute advertising flurries, mostly by industry foes of the measures.

Meanwhile, a tough rent-control proposition in Baltimore was narrowly leading in early returns.

KKK youth 'tagged along' with parents

GREENSBORO, N.C.(AP)— Sixteen-year-old Claude McBride often tagged along with his parents at Ku Klux Klan rallies. Sometimes he wore a Nazi wrist band to school.

"I believe the way the Klan believes, and I've raised my kids to believe the same — not to mix the races," said McBride's mother, Gail Caudle.

McBride and his stepfather, Rayford Caudle, are among 14 whites, most linked with the Klan or Nazi groups, held on charges stemming from the slayings of five persons at an anti-Klan rally in Greensboro on Saturday.

"I don't teach them to hate blacks. Give 'em the same respect you would anybody else, but as far as mixing the races or dating 'em, I just don't believe in that," Mrs. Caudle said.

Mrs. Caudle, interviewed at the family's small, one-story white frame house in northeast Winston-Salem, said McBride dropped out of school in the ninth grade this year "because he got messed up on what bus to take."

Bruce Tarkington, principal of Mineral Springs Junior High School, said McBride often wore a Nazi wrist band and the letters KKK written on his arm. Mrs. Caudie said her son transferred from Dalton Junior High to Mineral Springs because some blacks threatened to beat him and his younger brother, Tim.

McBride was the youngest of the 14 arrested in the attack on members of a communist group staging a "Death to the Klan" rally.

Another of the accused is Billy Joe Franklin, 33, of Boger City, who was laid off two weeks ago from his job as an upholsterer for Pilot Furniture Co. in Newton.

Franklin was persuaded by his wife, Linda, to join the Klan about two months ago, said his brother, Jerry.

"Billy Joe can't read and write and she had to read all the stuff about the Klan to him and get him to sign up as a member," Jerry Franklin said.

Harold Dean Flowers, 33, of northern Lincoln County, is the father of four and works for a J.P. Stevens textile plant in Boger City near Lincolnton. A native of Hickory, he grew up on Railroad Street, a group of decaying mill homes. His mother, Dolly Flowers, said he didn't own a gun and never discussed the Klan.

"He called Saturday night from jail and asked how we all were," she said. "I was scared. I'd seen on TV all those men shooting. I had no idea he was involved with that."

Roland Wayne Wood, 34, of Winston-Salem, who works for a construction company and has a 10-year-old son, said early last month that he founded a Nazi unit in Winston-Salem about seven months ago.

Colleen Sprinkler, a neighbor, said Wood "used to be a Nazi, but now he's in the Klan. He told us that."

Wood has a police record that includes convictions for larceny and forgery. Regarding the Klan, he said, "We love them, they're our white brothers."

Spikers bombard Keene, Westfield

By MAUREEN SULLIVAN
Collegian Staff

The women's volleyball team swept Keene State 15-5, 15-1, and rolled over Westfield State 15-5, 15-7, at their final home match at NOPE gym last night.

The Minutewomen used their fine backcourt defense to shut off Keene's offense. Led by Ellen Braun's spiking at the net in game one and Peggy Barber's serving in game two, UMass handled Keene easily.

Against Westfield State, UMass made several mistakes around the court, but the Owls couldn't take advantage. Despite slowing down because of errors, the Minutewomen overwhelmed Westfield at the net with key blocks and spikes.

Last night's matches marked the final home appearance for five of the women spikers—Kathy Shinnick, Donna Sasso, Chris Kelly, Chris Perron, and captain Joyce Gresl. All five saw action in both matches.

Said UMass coach Elaine Marasco of her team's performance, "We played very well; the seniors did an excellent job overall. We're ready for the Mass. State Championships."

The Minutewomen play their final match of the season tonight when they venture to New Haven to face Yale University. Last year, Elaine Marasco coached the women Elis to a first place seeding in the Ivy League Championships; they later competed in the Eastern Regionals.

This year, UMass was placed in the top spot for the Mass. State Championships; they'll play at Clark University in Worcester on Saturday.

UM grad now soccer coach

By FRANK PAPSADORE
Collegian Staff

Early each morning, Russ Kidd rises to face a full day of teaching, learning, working and playing. In case you didn't know, Kidd is the hustling, skilled and dedicated coach of the UMass soccer team.

A UMass graduate of the class of 1956, "Cap" Kidd, as he is affectionately called by everyone but his wife he concedes, lettered in three varsity sports, football, hockey, and lacrosse. He received the Samuel Grossman Trophy as athlete of the year in 1956. But curiously enough, Cap admits that he has never played a full game of soccer in his life.

Cap first came back to UMass in 1970 as an assistant lacrosse and hockey coach after spending 13 successful years at the high school level. But in 1975, during a University hiring freeze, Cap was offered the full time job as head soccer coach.

"I sort of fell into the job," Cap offered from behind his desk amid the trophies and placques he's acquired over the years. "At first I didn't think it would be my cup of tea, but thanks to Al Rufe's help and encouragement, I've become very, very happy here."

Rufe was the UMass soccer coach before Kidd. He is now the financial manager of the athletic department.

"Al helped me along at the start," Cap continued, "But I also had to pick brains at soccer clinics, I delved into my Phys Ed background, and I especially worked on the research and recruiting areas."

Cap boasts a 27-19-1 record in his four year tenure as a soccer coach. He has accomplished a great amount considering his limited resources. Not only is Cap new to soccer, but UMass offers no soccer scholarships.

"We score a big zero in that department," said Cap, referring of course to scholarships. "It's hard to compete with the Ivy League and all the other "big name" schools without the money. It's especially hard when we have to play against those same teams."

Coach Kidd also reflected on the new Out-of-state tuition hike.

"All I can say is that we have to intensify our in-state recruiting program," said Cap, "I can see the day coming when we will probably have an all Massachusetts player team. And I'd like that, mainly because I must say that many of the quality soccer players indeed do come from Massachusetts."

But Cap still insists that it will be hard to get them to play here.

"We cannot offer the players the fancy things in place scholarships that other schools can, such as extensive travelling schedules. We play all our games in New England."

Cap called soccer the "Poor Cousin" in Intercollegiate competition today, but says that's going to change.

"People are going bananas about soccer all over the country," says Kidd. "The crowds are getting bigger and more and more high schools are becoming aware of the program. I can see a very good future for it."

Men's soccer coach Russ Kidd. (Staff photo by John Bunting).

The men's soccer team, ranked eleventh in the latest New England poll and holders of a 6-4-2 record on the season travel to Springfield College to take on the Chiefs in an evening game beginning at 7:30. (Staff photo by John Bunting).

Stickwomen face Terriers

By MIKE ESTRADA
Collegian Staff

It will be back to business as usual for the UMass Field Hockey team tonight when the Eastern Regional's third seeded Minutewomen travel to Boston University for a 6:15 contest.

The previously unscheduled game, not listed in the University athletic schedule, was arranged by coach Pam Hixon in order to give her squad another practice game on Astroturf. UMass will play on Astroturf at the Eastern Association for Intercollegiate Athletics for Women a week from this Friday at Springfield College. The top three teams in the eight team tournament wil earn the right to travel to Princeton, N.J. for the nationals.

"I thought we'd be in the tournament," Hixon said. "I scheduled the game with BU to give us one more practice on the turf. We've played on astroturf three times this year; Westfield State, Northeastern, and Springfield." A check shows that UMass has not lost on astroturf since last year at Springfield in the Easterns.

UMass wil be looking to retrieve its scoring touch lost in last Sunday's game against Iowa which saw the Minutewomen take 21 shots against the winners of the Big Ten tournament only to settle for a tie with Laura O'Neil's 13th goal on a penalty stroke. But Hixon is quick to refute any idea that her team is having trouble scoring goals.

"Outside of the last four of five games we've been scoring a lot of goals," she said. Indeed, the stickers have been blowing away the teams they should. The teams that have traditionally been tough have been just that. Of the top six seeds for the Easterns (UConn, UNH, UMass, Dartmouth, Springfield and Yale) all games between the schools have been decided by one goal.

Hixon also admits that she would have preferred the number two seed as it would have meant the stickers would have met number seven seed URI instead of Yale in the first round. Call it a coincidence or anything you want, but UMas plays Yale this Saturday at NOPE.

"I think it will be a high scoring tournament because of the turf," Hixon said. As for her squad's own interests; "We peaked after UNH and then hit a valley, that happens. But we will peak again, we'll be ready."

NOTES: Senior All-American Laura O'Neil is the team's leading point-getter with 13 goals and 13 assists followed closely by the team's other All-American, Judy Strong with 16 goals and eight assists. An early season loss to UNH has come back to haunt UMass, the 1-0 decision is the only reason the 9-1-2 Wildcats are seeded above the 13-2-1 Minutewomen.

A hollow winter

For most colleges in the Northeast, the month of November signals the commencement of pre-season activities for winter sports. Of those sports the game of ice hockey generates a lot of, if not most of the interest on the campuses in this state along with the rest of New England. Included on that list of campuses is our own here in Amherst.

Yet, this year will have to be an exception here at UMass. In case no one told you, there is no longer any such thing as a UMass hockey team. As of May 4th of this year, the UMass athletic department officially dropped the ice hockey program from the "active" list. The decision came in the aftermath of last season's disastrous 1-18-1 season when the ice hockey team managed only a 6-4 win over Boston State.

Citing the lack of funds and the inability of the University to have a team that would be competitive on the Division II level, the athletic department here decided to suspend operations after what looked like a phasing-out program over the last four years. At best, it was an unpopular and unwise move for a university of this size in this geographical region. Not only did it leave a lot of hockey players up in the air, but it created a lot of resentment directed at the UMass athletic department which has proved more than once that it can move in mysterious ways.

For example, former head coach Jack Canniff was told three years ago not to promise a recruit that there would be a hockey program in existence for four years, according to some of his former players.

Now, a year later and minus a hockey team, Jack Canniff finds himself doing something else during the winter season after a 12-year tenure as the Minuteman mentor. Currently, the Arlington native is teaching tennis, jogging, ice hockey, and bowling in the physical education department. In addition, Canniff is now an advisor to the intramural ice hockey program here. Under a contract of unspecified length with the athletic department, Canniff has seen UMass hockey slide continually downhill after leading the team to the national Division II crown in 1972.

As for Canniff's former players, most of them are still playing hockey in some capacity. Former captain John Peters tried out for the Boston Bruins in pre-season, but was injured in the rookie camp and is now playing hockey somewhere on the Cape. A majority of other players are now skating with Billy the bartender on Barselotti's entry in the Amherst Rec Hockey League. Finally, winger Guy Kidd now skates with the Springfield Olympics on the "junior B" amateur level.

On the brink of the start of the 79-80 season, Canniff says that he really doesn't know if hockey will ever be brought back to life at UMass.

"It really won't be considered until we get our own ice," says Canniff. "Things like the proposed dome over Alumni Stadium (which would accomodate both basketball and hockey) just doesn't look too feasible right now."

I honestly hope that this is not typical of the type of decisions that will be made within the UMass athletic department in the future. Instead of trying to solve the problem, they simply made the whole situation disappear. Not, in my opinion, the best way that the situation could have been handled.

Cites 'intolerable' acts

Knapp raps violence

By BRIAN O'CONNELL
Collegian Staff

WORCESTER — University President David C. Knapp, speaking here yesterday at the UMass Board of Trustee's meeting, condemned campus-wide violence and vandalism over the Halloween weekend.

Both Knapp and the Trustees agreed to form a special ad-hoc committee to combat "anti-social behavior" on campus, and erase the "negative image" of UMass/Amherst.

Knapp's statements came one day after University Chancellor Henry Koffler announced a new 1 a.m. curfew to be implemented for non-students. According to the curfew, any non-student found on campus after 1 a.m. "without a legitimate purpose" will be asked to leave. Koffler also promised to increase lighting in high-priority areas.

Calling the Halloween weekend "rather frightening," Knapp told board members "the series of problems that have plagued the Amherst campus are intolerable. We can no longer excuse behavior of that kind at anytime. University students are the intellectual leaders of society."

Knapp said violaters of the curfew will be dealt with harshly.

Knapp also criticized a recent Boston magazine article dealing with the Amhert campus. "This article is an example of yellow journalism," he said. "It is a complete misrepresentation of the campus. Some quotes were taken completely out of context." He said he will meet with the Boston media to iron out "mis-information" concerning the Amherst campus.

Trustee Chairman Robert Healy expressed concern over the negative publicity the campus has received in the last week.

Healy told board members "the media themselves will be the first ones of admit that only the negative aspects (of UMass) will be stressed. No one ever tells the good side of the story. To them, good news is no news." Healy also questioned the term "Zoo-Mass," which he cited as an "improper term that outsiders use to describe UMass."

Student Senate President and Trustee Rich LaVoice said the administration is trying to reduce alcohol abuse at campus parties.

"The problem is," LaVoice said, "the students just don't have anything else to do. Unfortunately, this board can't raise the drinking age."

Dorm safety plan causes friction

By KAREN LIBUCHA
Collegian Staff

Last weekend's controversial, makeshift police security plan was "stuffed down your throats the way it was stuffed down our throats," Assistant Director of Public Safety Philip Cavanaugh said yesterday at a meeting between students and police.

Director of Public Safety Gerald O'Neil said at the Dickinson Hall meeting the new security plan, which resulted in police patrolling of dorm halls in Southwest Residential Area, was a mandate from division heads of the Office of Student Affairs.

The first installment of the new plan last weekend was "a significant over-reaction to the get-tough policy, which I do support," Melton M. Miller, Master/Director of Southwest said.

Students said dormitory patrolling is an infringement of their privacy. One student asked O'Neil, "How would you feel if a group of six policemen came in the front door of home for no apparent reason and went out the back?"

O'Neil, who was open to criticism yet noncommital on changes to the plan, said "All of our concerns are to provide safety for the campus."

Miller said he was upset with the police department's failure to notify the heads of residence and dorm security staff on the implementation of the new plan.

Since there were no arrests and a low level of criminal activity last weekend, the police had little to do. Consequently their presence seemed like harrassment rather than protection, Miller said. "I welcome their presence, but not how their presence was made," he said.

Consequently their presence seemed like harrassment rather than protection, Miller said. "I welcome their presence, but not how their presence was made," he said.

All participants of the meeting agreed there was a need for additional police protection, but the controversy surrounded the additional manpower.

Students suggested strengthening security through additional student and dorm staff inside the dormitories and increasing police outside the dormitories to respond when dorm security requires assistance.

Cavanaugh welcomed any formal, documented complaints by students upset by last weekend's abuse so illegal behavior by police officers could be investigated.

O'Neil said he wanted to "get rid" of the term 'SWAT teams" in the future.

Vice-Chancellor of Student Affairs Dennis Madson said the increased police security was one of eleven plans to curtail crime on campus, including the 1 a.m. curfew for visitors on campus.

Student Senate Speaker David Barenberg expressed student views and handed out complaint avadavits following the meeting.

Library forum discusses administration, money

By GARY RANDALL
Special to the Collegian

The newly-formed Coalition to Save the Library and an audience of 50 students comprised a forum yesterday afternoon in Bartlett Auditorium for a discussion of construction problems of the library and other UMass buildings.

The forum, sponsored by the coalition, lasted more than two hours. Coalition panel members gave representative statements for their campus groups, with students from the audience asking questions and criticizing the administration.

Representatives from SCERA, SUPE, MSP, USA, AFSCME, and GSEU make up the coalition, which was formed to deal with library problems and an unresponsive administration.

"UMass does not know what the problem with the library is, nor who is responsible, nor when it will be fixed," Professor Terence Burke said. "So there is no sense in beating our breasts or weeping in our beer."

Burke attended the forum on behalf of Chancellor Koffler, who was attending a Trustee meeting, according to Carol Rubin, coalition chairperson and forum mediator. Another forum has been scheduled two weeks from now.

The administration is presently working towards two goals, Burke said. They are first working to improve Goodell as rapidly as possible. They also intend to open the main library as much as they can and as quickly as possible.

Burke was critical of statements made by SCERA representative Bob Duquette, who said the main problem with the library was shoddy construction, completed in weather too cold for the materials involved.

The final reports have not been completed, Burke said. No one can know what is wrong until they are done, he said.

Duquette later defended himself, saying he had received his information from reports by Loomis and Loomis, the engineering firm responsible for the library's structural elvaluation.

GSEU panel member Mike Pill, a graduate student in economics, criticized the construction system used by the state, and called for publicly funded campaigns. "The truth is that the giving of campaign contributions is the surest way to get a building contract." he said, quoting a state representative.

Other members of the panel stressed that groups should work together to motivate the administration and the state legislature to be more considerate of student interests.

Kennedy off and running — officially

By JIM MORAN
Collegian Staff

BOSTON — Speaking to an audience of invited guests, relatives and supporters, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, the state's senior U.S. senator, yesterday made official his candidacy for the Democratic nomination for President in a speech at Faneuil Hall.

Kennedy said public service is "among the most honorable of professions," and that his 17 years experience in the Senate "has been my school in the way good intentions can be translated to achievement."

But the senator said his continuance in the Senate would not be useful "when the present difficulties grow so large that they threated the essential confidence of the nation." He continued "Only the President can inspire the common will to reach our goals."

"Therefore, I take the course compelled by events and by my commitment to public life. Today, I formally announce that I am a candidate for President of the United States," declared Kennedy.

Kennedy then took stands on issues, both domestic and foreign. "I am fully committed to the principle of equal opportunity, to the principle of progress for the poor and helpless, to a program to end the spiralling costs of health care," he said.

Calling for a "more coherent foreign policy," Kennedy warned, "Our adversaries must know that our defense will always be sufficient beyond doubt to protect our own land and our allies."

Switching to the economy, Kennedy spoke of "a new era of competition and innovation," an economy with a sound dollar such that other nations do not hold the United States "hostage to their products."

Turning to energy, Kennedy shouted, "We need not be permanent beggars at the banquet tables of OPEC rulers." He also advocated conservation and solar energy as alternatives to nuclear expansion.

Kennedy was accompanied by his wife, Joan, his daughter Kara, and sons Patrick and Teddy Jr. Also present were Kennedy matriarch Rose Kennedy, and Jacqueline Kennedy Onassis.

Outside, about 6,000 persons both supporters and anti-Kennedy demonstrators gathered to hear Kennedy's announcement on a public address system.

Of President Carter Kennedy said, "The most important step he has taken was authorizing the decontrol of the oil industry — a step which was most unwise and unjust."

Brown to join presidential race

LOS ANGELES (AP) — Gov. Edmund G. Brown Jr. left for Washington yesterday to formally launch his quest for the 1980 Democratic presidential nomination with "a frontal attack on the conventional wisdom of a dying political party."

The 41-year-old governor's announcement, scheduled today, will follow by less than a day the formal entry of Sen. Edward Kennedy of Massachusetts into the race against President Carter.

"No matter what the conventional wisdom says, no matter what the pundits and the poohbahs in Washington say, I'm prepared to mount a frontal attack on the conventional wisdom of a dying political party," Brown said at an airport news conference before leaving for the nation's capital aboard a commercial flight.

Dow Jones drops to new low

New York (AP) - The tense Iranian situation continued to take its toll on the stock market yesterday pushing the Dow Jones industrial average below the 800 level to a new low for the year.

The widely recognized average of 30 blue chips recorded its third straight substantial loss with a 9.81 drop to 796.67, its lowest close since it stood at 794.79 last Dec. 21.

Since the start of the week the average has fallen 22.27 points.

Hostages 'mishandled' in Iran

WASHINGTON (AP)— American hostages held in the U.S. Embassy in Iran are being "pushed around, abused, intimidated and mishandled," but there is no evidence that any have been seriously injured, a U.S. official said late yesterday.

Word of the mistreatment was given to reporters as President Carter's special mediators found themselves stalled in Turkey with Iranian authorities refusing to negotiate with them.

The official, who asked that he not be identified, said there was no evidence that any of the estimated 60 American hostages held in the U.S. Embassy in Tehran have been "beaten, stabbed or shot."

But State Department spokesman Hodding Carter said he had no evidence that there had been any shooting.

"We have been unable to confirm with any of our sources that there has been firing," the State Department spokesman said.

The two American negotiators sent to seek the release of the Americans held hostage were stalled in Turkey when Iranian leaders refused to let them into the country.

Ramsey Clark, a former U.S. attorney general, and William Miller, a staff member of the Senate Intelligence Committee, were reported by the State Department to be waiting in Istanbul for further instruction.

Student Senate appoints Bolger Atty. General

By JULIE EAGLE
Collegian Staff

Following 30 minutes of debate, Ann Bolger last night was approved by the Undegraduate Student Senate as student attorney general in a secret vote of 56-10.

"I think Ann is extremely well-qualified," Student Senate Speaker David Barenberg said of the appointment. "But more important, I think we now have someone in office who can start working to increase the effectiveness credibility of the senate judiciary. . .The issue (of selecting and attorney general) has taken too long. Now we can get down to business."

Bolger, with Jon Hensleigh and Julie Robertson, had been one of three candidates recommended by the Student Government Association co-presidents Brian Burke and Richard LaVoice by an attorney general selection committee. Burke and LaVoice, authorized to recommend one of the three candidate to the Senate, last week recommended Hensleigh, who was voted down.

Endorsing Bolger, LaVoice last night told the Senate, "As an undergraduate, Ann brings with her many outstanding qualities which makes her well qualified for the position of attorney general. . .Ann had had a stellar track record in terms of unselfish devotion to the UMass community. This service varies from setting up a judiciary in John Adams (a tower in the Southwest Residential Area) to working as a Rape Counselor Advocate."

According to Bolger's resume and application, the senior Legal Studies major has also served as a project coordinator at Belchertown State Hospital; a George Washington Upper assistant head of residence; a peer sexuality educator; a student academic counselor; a summer orientation counselor; a John Adams Upper student head of residence; an advocate for the Northampton Association for Retarded Persons; and a staffer for the Northampton-based Community Homes for Children.

Bolger is currently serving as an intern at the Amherst law firm of Sheppard and Hancock.

Voicing opposition to Bolger's appointment, Marea Wexler, a Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy volunteer, said, "I think it's very important that the person who's attorney general is as objective as possible...that she have little or no association with the (SGA) presidents whatsoever."

Wexler, echoed by Governmental Affairs Chairperson Tony Johnson and Senator Nelson Lyle, said she was referring to Bolger's close association with Burke and LaVoice.

Blame at Russell's shared?

By BRIAN O'CONNELL
Collegian Staff

Three eyewitnesses to the recent incident at Russell's Liquor store in which three area women said they were attacked by Amherst Police officers, told the Collegian yesterday both the women and the store management were at fault for the incidnet.

The three women involved, Hampshire College student, Ada Griffin, Amherst College student Gina Stevens, and Amherst College Librarian Sheila Johnson, were arrested at Russell's on September 29 on charges of disorderly conduct. According to the Amherst Defense Committee, the women claimed they were "attacked and physically brutalized by four Amherst Police Officers" while being placed under arrest. The three are scheduled to appear in Hampshire County District Court on Nov. 21.

Johnson recently told a group of supporters at a rally on the Amherst Common that the women were subject to "verbal and physical harassment by Amherst Police." Johnson also said that the three women were treated harshly after they were led to jail.

Barry Davis, 21, Debbi Nelson, 21 and Jeff Herndon, 22, all UMass students, said they arrived at Russell's at 10:50 p.m. on the night of the incident. "The place was extremely crowded," said Davis. "We came in while one of the women was arguing with a clerk over an I.D. problem, and the woman (Sheila Johnson) was saying that the clerk threw her I.D. back at her. Then she demanded to see the manager.

The three witnesses said the store clerk told them "Johnson didn't have any valid proof of age on her I.D."

"The police were called in rather quickly," Davis said. "The store manager didn't seem to want to deal with the women himself.

"Calling the police instigated the women," he said.

"The clerk called in the police and then the manager called the police," said Nelson. "The manager was the one who called the police. He was the one who started the whole thing."

Davis said the police officers were "very aggressive" and "very rude." Davis said he was "pushed around" by the police officers and was "thrown against the wall."

Davis said he was "pushed around" by the police officers and was "thrown against the wall." Davis said, "the situation had gotten out of hand. The police were not trying to reason with these women."

As the police made an attempt to grab Griffin, Davis said, "One of the woman (Johnson) calmed down considerably; she and the other woman (Stevens) were not resisting. She tried to get to (Griffin) who was struggling with one of the officers. They were all struggling. The police officer tried to restrain (Griffin), and (Johnson) tried to get to her friend. They all fell to the ground, with the officer landing on top of (Griffin). I wouldn't say that he was sitting on her. She was thrashing around so much that the policemen couldn't get her to her feet, so they dragged her out of the store. At this time it was 11:30."

"If the manager had never called the police, Nelson said, and had handled the problem himself, it might have never happened.

Herndon said the women were also at fault. "The women over-reacted. They seemed to have some kind of chip on their shoulder. What Johnson did was a disturbance, insulting customers and swearing like that."

The three witnesses said only one other customer was in the store during the incident. They decided to "tell what really happened" after reading all the "distorted facts" being written on the incident in local papers, according to Davis.

"I wish I had a camera, I'd very distinctly describe my shoes to these people," Davis said. "I called home and asked him where he was, he informed me that he was home at that time. I'm glad that this whole thing had gone for a reason."

Sinceros, Motels bring new wave to Wall

By BRETT MILANO
Collegian Staff

If the phrase "take me to your leader" has become a familiar one lately, or you were impressed by the musicianship on Lene Lovich's Stateless album, you should already be a Sinceros fan. The band hails from London, where they spent a few years playing in clubs before joining Ms. Lovick in the studios. Later this year they returned to the studio to record their own debut album, entitled The Sound of Sunbathing.

The album proves the band has a number of points in its favor. There is enough musical sophistication to satisfy critics, enough energy for the new wavers, and enough catchy tunes to get them on the radio. They occasionally bear a passing resemblance to the Cars, another band which has achieved the same synthesis.

However, the Sinceros seem to owe more to vintage 60's pop. Such tunes as "Little White Lies" are prime examples of the genre. Although they sometimes dabble with electronic effects, they never stray too far from a basic sound which resembles AM radio at its best. Only on "Take Me To our Leader" do they become blatantly Cars-ish and the song is good enough to make Ric Ocasek lose a few nights of sleep.

The Sinceros have adapted well to the studio, but the directness of their sound indicates that they may be even more impressive in concert.

Two new and promising new wave bands will perform together this Friday night the The Blue Wall in the Campus Center. To preview the potentiality of the concert, music critic Brett Milano reviews here the groups' recently released debut albums.

Don't show up late for the Sinceros concert at the Blue Wall this Friday, or you may miss a set by a lesser known but equally promising band. The Motels hail from Los Angeles, a city whose only other recent contribution to rock has been the Dickies. But with a debut album just released an a national tour underway, the Motels may be ready to put that city back on the map.

The album, called simply The Motels, shows them to be a band with great potential, with only a few rough spots. Lead singer-guitarist Martha Davis is the obvious focal point and has led many critics to compare the band to Blondie. This comparison is largely inaccurate, as the bands differ in their musical approach.

The Motels are at their best when they stick to straight-ahead rock, as they do on about half of these tracks. Titles such as "Porn Reggae" also show audacity. Their more ambitious numbers (like "Total Control", with its quirky, Cars-ish rhythms) don't work as well, but the Motels shld be able to try these experiments more successfully after they've had more experience in the studio.

On stage, the Motels will probably stress the more aggressive side of their music, and turn in a powerful show.

If you have nothing to say, *#?- you

SWAT teams, vertical tower patrols, burning ping pong tables flying through the sky, obscene lighting conditions, rape as a common event, plans to landscape the campus, an article in Boston magazine, an administration which denies the validity of the article in Boston magazine, an administration which denies any knowledge of UMass police busting into closed dormitory rooms not as a result of an article in Boston magazine all contribute to the befuddled nature of events plaguing this campus presently.

Chancellor Henry Koffler, the captain of the good ship UMass-Amherst, stressed in an informal meeting this week the problems of vandalism, violence, and a lack of courtesy were questions of "totality." There are obviously no segments within the community which have the resources or the ability to deal with the problems. "We must pull together," he said.

Pulling together requires student input. The solution can only be attained from the bottom-up—in other words, orders from Gov. King to President of UMass David Knapp to Chancellor Koffler to Vice Chancellor Madson to Director of Security Gerald O'Neil to Chief of Police Robert Joyce to the sergeant at the desk to the police on the street to us just doesn't make it.

Koffler, with Vice Chancellor of Students Dennis L. Madson by his side, outlined their belief they were "treading a thin line."

In reference to the 1 a.m. curfew for non-UMass students they demonstrated an awareness that this is a public institution and, by that definition, here to serve the people of the Commonwealth. There the thin line gets thinner in references to guests and the fear of a police state mentality.

It's almost as if they were throwing their arms into the air and saying, "We really don't know how to deal with it, it's so damn complicated."

Julie Robertson, a member of the Third World Caucus, asked some straight questions concerning specific injustices such as murder and rape. She questioned the due process of law. Koffler, unable to address the past situations pleaded newness, this being his first semester, to the situation. Art Clifford, director of public information, took over and after a three minute discourse said he felt his answer was inadequate.

James Lewis, the editor of Nummo News, asked why there wasn't adequate lighting. Koffler said the problem was minimal funding. When asked whybother landscaping prior to increased lighting, Koffler shrugged his shoulders. The man, sincerely, honestly, doesn't know. The reason: there is no answer.

In an open letter Koffler sent to the Collegian, which was printed on Tues. Nov. 6, he said, "I shall seek your advice as we attempt to halt the thoughtless and violent actions of a few...

"I need your support."

Well, it's the students' turn, just fill in the blanks...

Shining star?

Charlie Bagli

This campus has been hit hard by campaign fever. I haven't seen as many students so involved with a politician in a long time. People are talking about him, wearing his buttons, and doing work for him. But its time scratch the surface because all that glitters is not Kennedy.

Kennedy's role in the "Criminal Justice Codification, Revision and Reform Act" otherwise known as S-1 is instructive as to nature when stripped of the mystique. It also indicates just how different he is from all the other politicians.

When the S-1 bill appeared in Congress in 1975 it was condemned by activists, Church groups, the ACLU, the National Lawyers Guild and others. S-1 was designed to reform the Federal Criminal Code. Many people condemned it as a bill that "in practice would provide the basis for political repression reaching beyond that known at the height of the McCarthy period."

Some of the gems from the bill include:

* Defining a riot as a "public disturbance involving an assemblage of 5 or more persons that, by violent and tumultuous conduct, creates a grave danger of injury or damage to persons or property." Thus a demonstration in the course of which a garbage can or park bench was "gravely" threatened with "injury or damage" would become a riot.

* Draft board demonstrations and related activities such as encouraging draft resistance, bring participants within the rewritten statutes regarding treason, sabotage and sedition. These anti-war activities, described as "impairing the military effectiveness of the U.S.," are all felonies with sentences ranging from 3 to 30 years and the usual $100,000 fine.

* Journalists who received classified information, such as the Pentagon Papers, would be required to turn it over to the government immediately and furnish the identity of the person who leaked it. To defy this issue could mean 7 years and a $100,000 fine to the reporters, editors or publishers involved.

* S-1 attempts to get around the Furman decision (which in essence outlaws the death penalty) by making the death penalties mandatory. It is claimed that a mandatory death penalty would eliminate the discriminatory nature of past laws that the Supreme Court found so reprehensible.

The bill came back to life as S-1437 last year under Kennedy's and McClellan's sponsorship. The bill, which was equally repugnant, passed in the Senate, but was defeated in the House.

These items and the others like them, combined with a section allowing for a very wide interpretation of the bill as opposed to a "strict construction" make S-1 a very serious threat.

The uproar over S-1 made it die a noisy death. The backers, which included Kennedy, decided to change tactics. They felt that changing the name (S-1) and fiddling with some of the provisions would give it a better chance of being passed.

After S-1437 was defeated Kennedy was in no hurry to resurrect it. He then sought the Chairmanship of the Senate Judiciary Committee, It is rumored that to get the position he had to make a deal with the ranking Republican on the Committee. In exchange for the position Kennedy would push S-1722. This rumor corresponds to Time magazine's article (11-5-79) which comments that Democrats are surprised "by his ability to get along with the Committee's ranking Republican, former Segregationalist Strom Thurmond of South Carolina."

This bill would have died witnout Kennedy's support.

It is ironic that Kennedy, who has recently called for a moratorium on the building of nuclear power plants, is a big mover behind a bill that could put the very people responsibile for such a possibility, the anti-nuke activists, in prison.

Kennedy's involvement with this very repressive piece of legislation tells us a lot about him. The liberal glitter is tarnished by his sponsorship of these bills. Deals made with McClellan and Thurmond make him stand out for slickness rather than leadership and high principles. A quick look at some of his other positions show that this is the rule rather than the exception for Kennedy.

On almost every foreign policy issue Kennedy agrees with Carter. The difference between them on foreign as well as domestic items is usually one of degree.

In January, he endorsed Carter's budget for fiscal 1980 of $531 billion. Kennedy then called for a $4 billion cut from the defense budget to be spent on domestic needs; very impressive play for the press. However, when it came time to vote on it in the Senate, Kennedy voted for an $18.5 billion dollar increase in the defense budget.

Kennedy's opportunism is only matched by his vacuous economic program. For the problems of unemployment, housing and inflation Kennedy invokes the Ghost of Good Times Past: "I believe those economists who say that psychology contributes—at least 50 percent to the state of the economy." There isn't much more to his program than that. Psychology doesn't pay $1 a gallon for gas or $1.89 for hamburgers or give somebody a job (that's not a psychologist).

The overwhelming interest in Kennedy by many students reflects a desire for some kind of change in the present malaise. Many people feel that Kennedy can provide answers to the problems of the US today as no other politician can. A look at Kennedy's record disputes that feeling.

Kennedy ranks fourth among Senators in support of Carter's positions on roll-call votes; so far this year, he has backed Carter 85 times and opposed him only 12. Kennedy is the same as what we already have. And our choices this year are the same as four years ago, and four years before that: which tarnished rhinestone is going to screw us for another four years.

Our name need not be in vain

To the Editor:

In response to the many articles in the past week dealing with the horrendous reputation of UMass, I would just like our community to know what out-of-staters think of us.

I am a transfer student from Baltimore, Md. and had no idea that UMass had such a bad reputation until I started studying here.

True, we do have a lot of problems with vandalism and sexual discrimination, but why can't people realize that other colleges have the same problems? Why does UMass have to suffer because of some dissatisfied students or visiting friends that have a few bad experiences in their stay here?

If students would stick up for UMass and pass a good word to family and friends that ask about it, maybe the so-called bad reputation would turn into a more reputable one.

It's too bad there's not more out-of-state students here to spread the word to in-state residents!

The 'Masters of Mozzarella'

To the Editor:

It is my unhappy task to alert everyone to an insidious conspiracy now threatening our nation. I refer to the monopolization of our country's pizzerias by Italians and Greeks.

Through control of one of America's most beloved foods, these ethnic groups are surely subverting our conciousness! Please understand, I have nothing against Greeks or Italians personally, and in fact, some of them are my close friends, but nevertheless, these "Masters of the Mozzarella" are striking at the very heart of society.

This should not be interpreted as a racist attack, but rather as warning: the culinary policy of the United States is in jeopardy if we let a couple of minority ethnic groups dominate this most influential of foods!

Southwest vs. SWAT team

To the Editor

This letter is is regard to the recent attacks the U. Mass police have begun to n ke on Southwest. I am a resident of Washington Tower and strongly object to the stormtrooper tactics the police are performing on my home. On more than occasion, this past weekend, I have been stopped, questioned, and asked to produce identification. Each time I was doing nothing more than riding the elevators or standing in my hall corridor. I was not acting suspiciously, creating a disturbance, or in the area of a crime. Nevertheless, the police intimidation continues.

I am not a criminal, I am a legal adult and should be treated accordingly. I will not stand for this unnecessary police harassment. These searches, although legal, should cease immediately. Southwest must unite against this uncalled for police intrusion into our homes.

Washington gets burned

To the Editor:

Last Saturday night (11/3/79), four members of the UMass police force showed up here at Washington Tower for no apparent reason other than to harass the residents. They arrived on the scene like a SWAT force on a nursing home. The tower was as quiet as I've seen it this year because many students had gone home.

Rumor has it that these "vertical patrols" will be occuringevery weekend night. I suggest that these searches are not being carried out in the best interest of Washington's residents in mind. Furthermore, I suggest that my fellow dorm members not let this harassment carry on. A concerted effort will be our only tool in handling this annoyance to residence hall students.

Jewish writer seeks to relate politics, religion

By Debbie Wallace
Collegian Staff

Jewish author Arthur Waskow yesterday stressed the importance of bringing together Jewish politics and religion.

Waskow, a member of "Fabragan" (Yiddish for coming together), a B'nai Brith Hillel - sponsored lecture explained the importance of the participatory manner of the group. A Washington D.C. based group, "Fabragan" stems from a National Jewish Organization, Havurat.

He said the leadership of the services and adult study groups is rotated so "all of us share in the leadership process."

Waskow, a self-professed storyteller by nature, interprets Torah (Bible) passages, and while not an official theologian, his books and ideas, he said, "have aroused heated debates within the groups resulting in a deep analysis of the Torah."

God Wrestling, his latest book published in 1978 addresses well-known Torah stories in a "new way of expressing Jewishness."

He explained the title stems from the story of Jacob who returns to his brother with whom he has had bad relations. In the night, Jacob wrestles with an angel and wrestles with his guilt stemming from his past beratement of his brother.

Waskow said in the act of wrestling you hover between " making war and making love,between choking and embracing." He said it depends upon us, "If we can make a shift in reality and open up, go one step past fear and guilt, we can grapple with everything we are."

Waskow said he feels the whole Jewish tradition is to find meaning to inform our lives. "We shouldn't turn our back on the texts nor bow down to them."

He said he believes religious and social change should not be separate. His latest project, Menorah, a Jewish monthly handbook, will be introduced in two weeks with a December issue. He said it is a "how-to-do-it " handbook, a way of viewing holidays and traditions in a different light."

He said the newsletter draws on Havurat practices. Locally, there is a pioneer valley organization called Havurat Ha-emek formed in 1975. U.Mass Rabbi Saul Perlmutter said UMass Hillel services are run in this free style, with participants suggesting topics they are interested in discussing."

Waskow said it is important for Jews to infuse political clout with the Torah. He said the most urgent problem facing Jews is that God promised the land of Israel twice, and if that is so, something has to be done about it.

He also said socialism, capitalism, and liberalism do not take into consideration the rhythms of nature. "These ideologies deal with society and politics, but as the Torah teaches --if you poison the earth, it poisons you back."

People are stuck on the belief that political and spiritual are separate according to Waskow.

Waskow's other books include, The Bush Is Burning, Running Riot, and The Freedom Sedar a new Passover Haggada. He will speak today at Mount Holyoke, 12 p.m. at the Eliot House, on the sparks of Jewish revival.

The lectures are sponsored by the 5-College B'nai Brith Hillel.

Joan pledges support for Ted

BOSTON (AP) — Her voice quavering, Joan Kennedy said yesterday she looks forward to campaigning and to "my husband being a candidate and being the next president of the United States."

Mrs. Kennedy has been living in an apartment in Boston, apart from her husband, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, since early 1978. More than a year ago she disclosed that she was an alcholic, but said she has licked the problem with the help of Alcholics Anonymous and has not had a drink for over a year.

Women's Week plans take form

By SUSAN HOROWITZ
Collegian Staff

The International Women's Week committee, in their first meeting last night, discussed organizational planning for that week.

A proposal was made to represent various groups by means of a steering committee. Some of the groups included the Student Center for Education and Advocacy, the Registered Student Organization, Third World Task Force, Socialist Feminist Collective, and Everywoman's Center.

Other committees deal with fund raising, entertainment, workshops, childcare, publicity and transportation.

No date for the commencement of the week has been set, but was tentatively scheduled to begin close to March 8, International Women's Day.

As in the past, funding will be provided by campus groups and possibly greater Amherst organizations.

Committee members decided to begin the planning at an early date this year due to general chaos during the last year's organization of the International Women's Week.

In the past, International Women's Week has included workshops on racism, women's issues, health care, violence against women, and working women.

Two arrested

"Take the time to look around," Richard David Boudreau spray painted yesterday beside his artwork of huge red, green and black birds on the outside of the wall of the Graduate Research Center, UMass police said.

The 18-year-old UMass student from South Hadley was arrested at 4:40 p.m. and charged with malicious destruction of state property and possession of marijuana, police reported.

UMass student Richard B. Steele was arrested yesterday in an unrelated incident, and charged with annoying telephone calls, and assault and battery after a private complaint from a female student, police said.

The assault and battery took place on October 21, police said, and the annoying telephone calls over the last two weeks. The police did not say where the incident took place.

Stickwomen, booters lose

BOSTON — The women's field hockey team downed the BU Terriers last night by a score of 2-0. Laura O'Neil scored both goals for the Minutewomen, assisted on the first goal by Karen Laverdiere and on the second by All American Judy Strong. The goals upped O'Neil's season point total to 14 goals to go along with 13 assists.

Minutewomen goalie Robin Jennings picked up her third shutout of the season, making 16 saves during the game.

Details tomorrow

Springfield— A goal by Springfield's Bob Wheble at the 22:34 mark of the second half powered the Chiefs to a 1-0 victory over the Minutemen last night at Springfield College.

UMass managed to outshoot the Chiefs 13—12 but were unable to put the ball inside the Springfield net. The Minutemen also edged the Chiefs in corner kicks five to two. The game was the last of the season for the Springfield team.

The trials and tribulations of a sports photographer

Jim Mahoney

The inspiration for this article came to me while a colleague and I were covering a recent Hartford Whalers hockey game at the Springfield Civic Center. I was sitting in the penalty box shooting the game, minding my own business, when suddenly I was accosted and nearly cold-conked by a Whaler and friend from the Toronto Mapleleafs who decided to have a high sticking fight right in front of the penalty box. This caused another photographer and myself to dive to the floor to avoid the flailing sticks of the combatants. I later remarked to the fellow next to me that I'd feel safer out on the ice than in the box. Later, my buddy the "scribe" asked me, "Why didn't you bring home a souvenir from the game?" to which I replied, "What, with my teeth!"

This led me to thinking of other incidents when other fellow photographers and I have nearly suffered damage and serious injury at sporting events. Off the top of my head, I can think of Bill Greene and Jay Ferrarone, both Collegian photographers at one time or another, who were both run down on the "protected sidelines" at a Minuteman football game by the infamous student body right. Fortunatly, both survived the traumatic experience unscathed, with only their pride hurt. Jay's takedown was spectacular enough to merit UPI coverage and the photo even made the Springfield Union. I have also been the victim of UMass football coverage. While the team was playing B.U. at B.U. last fall under conditions similar to hurricane David rather than a perfect fall afternoon, I took what can only be described as the "Nestea Plunge" into one of the lakes on the sideline. What had happened was that UMass had driven the length of the field and was on the verge of scoring, and I sensed a fullback up the middle for the score. I sprinted around the corner of the end-zone in hope of getting a photo, but much to my surprise, I ended up on my keester in six inches of water, equipment and all. This event caused my colleagues, who had witnessed the incident, to nickname me "Puddles Mahoney."

The recent URI game had an almost-disaster for any photographer. I was leaning over the sideline with my telephoto lens following the play through when I suddenly had the entire lens go white as I peered through it. An URI end had sprinted past the end of my lens on a sideline pattern, and just narrowly missed the lens with his knee. The impact would have surely sent my camera, lens and my nose down to the other end of the field. My God! I'd still be picking up the pieces if he had hit me.

Basketball provides the sports photographer the unique problem of trying to get the photo of the perfect dunk or lay-up, but without getting a size thirteen crammed down his throat. Many a photographer has paid the price for the Pulitzer. I have also been almost bowled over by seven foot monoliths and abused by the leather sphere that makes up the game. While focusing on the hoop I failed to realize that the ball had been batted in my direction, and the next thing I know the damned thing was painfully situated in a rather tender spot in my lap. (Have you ever noticed that when a guy gets caught off guard he always gets hit in that spot?) I have since learned that you shoot basketball with both eyes open!

Baseball appears by far to be the one spot where a photographer will never be in a position of peril. However...I found a way to do it. By situating myself on the third base side of the field I figured I would be able to get some shots of the game. I did neglect to take into account that foul balls on the third place side would provide a sound reason for the third baseman, catcher, shortstop and umpire to all converge in that general area. Well sure enough, it happened, I was sitting there when the next thing I know the third baseman, catcher, shortstop and oh yes the umpire were all running in my direction, pointing in the air, yelling "I got it, I got it", I never did find out who got it; all I know is that I didn't get it.

Soccer and lacrosse—the other major sports here at the University—have yet to pose a threat to my existence. But I've still got time to find out. So as I race from one end of the field to the other avoiding balls, sticks and people, all I keep saying to myself to myself is..."I wonder if Frank O'Brien started this way."

Swimwomen open season at home against Vermont

This weekend will be a big one for the UMass women's swim team as it hosts the University of Vermont in the season opener. The meet will be on Saturday, at 1 pm at NOPE pool. Last year the swimwomen were defeated 69-67, and they are hoping to turn the tables in their favor.

The team as a whole has a lot more depth than in previous seasons, as compared to UVM who seem to be about the same as last year. Coach John Nunnelly commented about everyone being a bit edgy for the first meet, but he is very confident that performance will reflect that the team is right on target.

Swimming is a sport which requires a delicate balance of training. Coach Nunnelly said that at this point in the season, the women cannot afford the luxury of tapering. Tapering would mean sacrificing potential goals and therefore the women will continue their rigorous training through this half of the season.

A victory is expected from the women who will be primed for good times. On Tuesday night the swimwomen will try to make it two in a row against another team who defeated them by a small margin. It seems as if this will be the start of an exciting and winning swimming season.

The women's swim team opens up its season this Saturday afternoon at the NOPE pool at 1:00 against the University of Vermont. (Collegian file photo).

Sutter wins Cy Young

By JAMES LITKE
Associated Press

CHICAGO —Reliever Bruce Sutter, whose split-fingered fastball saved 37 games last season for his Chicago Cub teammates and tied a National League record in the process, yesterday was named winner of the NL Cy Young award for 1979.

"I was shocked. I really thought Joe Niekro would get it," he told reporters in Chicago. "When you win an award like this it's not really one man, but the entire team.

"Individual honors are fine," he added, "but I would trade it in for a World Series ring."

Sutter, who came within one save of the major league record set by John Hiller of the Detroit Tigers in 1973, narrowly defeated 21-game winner Joe Niekro of the Houston Astros in voting by the Baseball Writers Association of America.

The 26-year-old right-hander earned 10 of the 24 first-place ballots to become the second NL reliever and the third in baseball history to win the prize. Mike Marshall won it for the Los Angeles Dodgers in 1974 and Sparky Lyle of the New York Yankees took the American League honor in 1977.

Sutter also received six second-place votes and four thirdplace votes for a total of 72 points, with five points awarded for first-place mention, three points for second and one for third.

"In the National League, where there's no designated hitters, a bullpen can figure into about 130 games a year," he said. "I think that may be one reason relievers are a little more recognizable."

Niekro finished second with 66 points. Strikeout champion J.R. Richard of the Houston Astros was third with 41 points; followed by Tom Seaver of the Cincinnati Reds, 20; Pittsburgh Pirates reliever Kent Tekulve, 14, and Phil Niekro of the Atlanta Braves, who was sixth with three points.

Sutter credited the arrival on May 23 of former New York Yankee Dick Tidrow with "taking a lot of the work load off my arm. Because Dick was able to work as much as he did, I was able to keep my strength through the season."

Sutter appeared in 62 games for the Cubs, who ended the season in fifth place in the NL East Division after fading from contention late in August.

He compiled a 6-6 record and a 2.23 earned run average in 101 innings, striking out 110 batters and walking just 32 in becoming the second member of the Cubs to win the Cy Young. Ferguson Jenkins won it for Chicago in 1971.

From a Sox fan

Dear Mr. Sullivan,

Well, Haywood, you've certainly done it again! Last year we had to absorb the shock of looking at Luis Tiant in pin stripes and Bill Lee passing through customs at the Canadian border. Now you've let Bob Watson slip away. I suppose it's only natural based on your past actions as Red Sox chief that this had to happen. After all, Watson had talent. Something you obviously lack.

If you think you can calm me down by signing Lerrin Lagrow, past president of the Bert Campaneris Fan Club, the always popular Skip Lockwood, or that cro-magnon catcher, Milt May, you've got something coming.

Admittedly, I haven't been a Sox fan as long as some of the geriatrics who have supported the club since it was known as the Boston Pilgrims, but in the thirteen years that I have offered my verbal support to this club, I have been rewarded with but two American League pennants and I feel that after this past debacle of a season, the least you could have done is insure us fans that the best hitter we've gotten in years, Bob Watson, would be with us for more than half a season.

Since the free agency frolics began four years ago, what has your club brought us but Mike "four-run first inning" Torrez, a wilted Bill Campbell, a $100,000 per year bench warmer in Jack Brohamer, and Steve Renko, master of the early season fade.

If you think you deserve some milk and cookies for drafting Dave Goltz, I have some tough news for you to swallow; so did twelve other teams. And knowing how cheap you are, I don't expect to see him in a Bosox uniform either.

When are you going to get off your duff and bring the fans of Boston a championship of a team? Carl Yastrzemski is not going to last forever, Haywood, and I would kind of think that one of your obligatory duties would be to get this man to the World Series one more time.

Your buddy over there in the Big Apple, what's his name, uh Steinbrenner, now there's a man who knows how to get free agents. Don't get me wrong, Hay baby, I'm not a Yankees rooter, but at least they'll have some biv talent in their lineup oext year. And what do we have to look forward to. We ain't got a catcher cause Pudge done blown out his arm, Allenson can't go 162 games, and Montgomery's about ready for Medicare. We don't have a lefty starter cause you sent the best we had off to Montreal for a mediocre infielder who didn't even hit as well as the man he was traded for.

And to top it all off, you got the Fred Lynn mess to deal with. If you screw that up and lose him, I wouldn't walk the streets alone if I were you. personally, if you could get, say, Dave Winfield and Bob Shirley for him, or Yeager, Cey, and a decent pitcher from the Dodgers, then go ahead and make the deal, but anything less than that and the fans would skip hanging you in effigy and go for the real Haywood right away.

Your are treading on very thin ground at this moment, sir, and if you are the least bit intelligent, which would be giving you the benefit of a doubt, you would hop on the nearest train to Timbuktu and never return. We fans of the Boston Red Sox have suffered long enough and it is time for us to have a winner in Fenway Park.

Sincerely,
Steve Zack
Red Sox fan

Iranian students refuse talks with PLO

By The Associated Press

Iranian students holding the U.S. Embassy in Tehran rejected a bid by the Palestine Liberation Organization on yesterday to negotiate freedom for their American hostages, Tehran radio said. In Lebanon, a second attempt to seize a U.S. Embassy was reported foiled.

In a grisly display of the Iranian students' anti-American zeal, a protester set himself afire outside the Tehran embassy, Iran's Pars news agency said. He was later reported near death in a hospital.

The students, meanwhile, released what they said was embassy correspondence showing that U.S. officials had planned last summer to allow Shah Mohammad Reza Pahlavi into the United States permanently.

In Beirut, Lebanese security sources said the PLO thwarted a plan by 40 armed Iranians to storm the U.S. Embassy in the Lebanese capital. The sources told The Associated Press the alleged plotters were under house arrest in a Palestinian refugee camp in southern Lebanon.

Spokesmen for the PLO and the U.S. Embassy in Beirut said they had no information on the reported takeover plan, and it could not be confirmed elsewhere.

It was announced that President Carter, overseeing U.S. efforts to free the hostages, had canceled his planned trip to Canada today and tomorrow.

The rejection of the PLO mission seemed to kill one of the best hopes for ending the explosive situation quickly and peacefully.

The students said Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini, supreme leader of Iran's Islamic republic, and his secretive Revolutionary Council backed them in rebuffing the two-man PLO mediation team, Tehran radio reported in a broadcast monitored in Kuwait.

They would not "open talks with anybody or accept any mediation," the students said, until the United States met their main demand — sending the exiled shah back to Iran for trial.

Room & Board:
Fee increases proposed

By JOAN McKENZIE
Collegian Staff

University administrators are proposing two major increases for residence hall rents and dining commons fees to take effect next fall. The porposals are a starting rent increase of $120. For residence halls and $70 for boarding hall fees.

The proposals are subject to Board of Trustee approval.

In addition to an increase in the residential halls fee, a new billing system is being designed.

The residential hall fee for fiscal year 1980 was $794 dollars for unrenovated dorms and $854 dollars for renovated dorms. The fee was not distinguished according to room size. The new proposal would determine the increase based on whether a student is assigned a double, a designated single or a double single room.

The rent increases for unrenovated dorms would be as follows: a double room would be $914, an increase of $120, a designated single $1,014, and increase of $220; and a double single, $1,064, a rent increase of $270, according to Robert Cleary, chairman of the student rents and fees committee.

Fee increases for renovated dorms would be the same. The cost of living in a double would be $974, a designated single $1,074 and a double single $1,124.

Rent increases for Sylvan dormitories, which currently pay $20 more for suite style living, would be an increase of $100 from $874 to $974.

Percentage increases are 14 percent for a double, 22 percent for a designated single and 26 percent for a double single.

Regarding the residential increase, committee member Al Wallace said "there has to be some increase due to inflation, however a $120 increase is above and beyond the burden a normal student is expected to bear." Wallace further said "The University has 1.4 million dollars in excess lease payments."

The boarding halls fee from $854 to $924 is a $70 increase at eight percent.

Other proposed increases are a $12 fee addition to Health Services, and an Athletic fee increase of $10.

Also, there is a new proposal to change the billing for identification cards. Students would be charged four dollars the first year which would cover all four years instead of $1 a year.

All students can attend two fee reviews about the proposed increases between Vice Chancellor for Administration and Finance George Beatty, Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs Dennis Madson, and the rents and fees committee.

The committee is a representative of the student body that challenges proposed increases. It receives copies of the University's proposed budget increases and then investigates their validity.

"We make proposals to vice chancellors to save student money by evaluating rationales and financial statuses in order to present a student point of view and alternatives to increases" said Cleary.

The first session of the fee review is next Tuesday, Nov. 13 at 7:30 p.m. in room 374 in Whitmore Administration Building.

Residential fee increases will be challenged Thursday November 15 at 7:30 p.m. in room 917 in the campus center.

The Rents and Fees Committee urges all students to attend.

Amherst frat's initiation leads to probation

By CAROLYN MOONEY
Collegian Staff

A recent Amherst College fraternity initiation rite that began as a humorous gimmick has ended with the fraternity's being placed on indefinite probation by an angry President Julian Gibbs.

According to Chi Phi Fraternity President Mark Davis, a pledge from that fraternity was taken from the showers after hockey practice Tuesday night and strapped naked and laughing onto a chair in front of Gibbs' house, with a bottle of scotch to present Gibbs as a present. One of the fraternity members then rang the doorbell, which was answered by Mrs. Coralee (Smith College '46) Gibbs.

"She was understandably upset," Davis acknowledged yesterday, "but she was pleasant about it." Davis added that Gibbs did not accept the scotch.

In a letter circulated throughout campus the following day, Gibbs said the initiation rite reflected "a flagrant disregard for acceptable standards of conduct and of respect for persons and property on this campus." He said the fraternity would be immediately placed on indefinite probation, and complaints would be filed with the Dean of Students' Office against those individuals who participated.

While under probation, the coed fraternity on Route 9 will not be allowed to hold social activities or serve alcoholic beverages, and all members must abide by "the standards of decent conduct expected of everyone in the Amherst Community," Gibbs' letter stated.

Davis said the fraternity has written a letter in response to Gibbs' statement which will be distributed to all students and published in the Amherst College newspaper, The Student.

"We want to show that our intentions were good, not malicious," Davis said. "We were trying to be funny. We apologize and admit we may have been wrong." But Davis said Chi Phi and the other fraternities on campus still believe Gibbs overreacted.

"Gibbs himself (Amherst '46) was a big practical joker in his day," Davis pointed out.

Chi Psi Fraternity President Joe Spalluto agreed. "When the same initiation was done to Davis two years ago, he got a letter from (former president) Ward treating the whole thing as a jest," he said.

Amherst College students seemed unruffled by Tuesday night's incident. "It's pretty typical for Chi Phi," noted Amherst College senior Bruce McNamara. "They're definitely original." Other recent initiation rites have included a debate on oral sex and a mock strip performance by a team wearing jock straps and body paint, both in the library. A popular rite several years ago was to have pledges xerox their rear ends on the library copying machine.

"The students appreciate our humor- it's the administration who doesn't," Davis said.

Gibbs, his wife and the Office of Public Affairs all declined comment on the situation yesterday.

Brown campaigns in Boston

BOSTON(AP)— California Gov. Edmund G. Brown Jr. paid his first visit to Kennedy country as a full-fledged presidential candidate yesterday,and charged the Carter administration with creating a recession to deal with inflation.

"It's a very small group of people dictating a recession that will put tens of thousands of small businesses into bankruptcy," the newly announced Democratic contender told a lunch time crowd at Quincy Market. "That may be a cure for inflation but there must be a better way."

Brown said that by creating unemployment, Carter's economic policies will hit hardest at those on the bottom rungs of the economic ladder.

"I predict at least a million people will become inflation fighters" he said, caustically referring to future job losses.

Crews clean Quincy spill; 15,000 gallons of oil remain

BOSTON(AP)— More than half the 29,000 gallons of home heating oil spilled into the Fore River in Quincy had been cleaned up by yesterday, but at least another week of work remained, the Coast Guard said.

Coast Guard spokesman Dale Gardner said most of the remaining oil was in the Adams Cove area, where some contamination of marshes had occurred.

He said about 15,000 gallons had been cleaned up by midday yesterday.

The No. 2 oil was spilled Tuesday near beaches in Germantown and Quincy Point due to an unloading error by a crew member of the barge George P. Tilton, which was delivering the oil to the Mobil Oil Corp. docks, authorities said.

Crew members at first reported the spill as only 200 gallons.

But Gardner said Mobil Oil reported it was missing 29,000 gallons of oil, and the Coast Guard was accepting that as the size of the spill.

Energy department begins New England conservsation

By STEVEN A. COHEN
Associated Press

BOSTON — The U.S. Energy Department kicked off a conservation program in New England yesterday, claiming its low cost recommendations could save the average household 25 percent on its winter fuel bill.

Federal and state energy officials said at a news conference that a packet of "low cost-no cost" conservation recommendations and a gadget to cut shower water waste will be mailed to all 4.5 million households in New England.

The $2.6 million program will be followed by a $100,000 evaluation survey, and the package will be mailed to households across the nation if the program is found to be successful in New England.

The New England region was selected for the pilot program because of its heavy dependence on imported oil and its severe winter weather.

Gov. Edward J. King said at a Statehouse news conference that Massachusetts uses more imported oil than any other state, and the projected winter fuel cost for the average Massachusetts homeowner who heats with oil is $1,200.

And King said that "$1.5 billion is the amount over last year that is going to be extracted from consumers in Massachusetts because of OPEC increases."

If only 10 percent of the New England households follow through and save 25 percent on their fuel consumption, that will amount to a saving of 11,500 barrels per day, or $104 million per year, it was reported at the news conference.

Announcing the program, along with King, were John M. Deutch, U.S. undersecretary of energy, and other national and regional officers of the Department of Energy.

"Conservation is not curtailment; it is not doing without," Deutch said. "It is using energy more efficiently."

US machines built Soviet missiles

WASHINGTON(AP)— The Soviet Union apparently has used sophisticated machines purchased from the United States to improve the accuracy of its largest and most deadly nuclear missile, a Pentagon intelligence expert said yesterday.

The official said "it seems like a reasonable presumption" that precision miniature ball bearing grinding machines made in the United States were used in developing the guidance system of the Soviets' 308 SS-18 "heavy" missiles.

Those machines and other purchases from Western countries "have made or are making a distinct contribution to the Soviet military procurement effort," said Dr. Jack Vorona, a science and tehnology specialist in the Pentagon's Defense Intelligence Agency.

He testified before a Senate armed services subcommittee investigating Soviet weapons development.

"Would it be accurate to say American know-how is being used to develop the Soviet war machine?" asked Sen. Harry Byrd, I-Va., chairman of the procurement subcommittee.

"Yes sir, very accurate," Vorona replied.

He testified that an automated foundry purchased in the United States is being used to make engines for trucks used in the Soviet military, and that precision forging equipment purchased in Austria is being used in the production of gun tubes for Russian artillery.

Vorona said the Soviets are seeking Western technology and equipment "by any and all means," adding that, "An entire series of Soviet computers is based on IBM 360 and 370 computers that were illegally diverted into the Soviet Union in 1971 and 1972."

Sales of U.S. goods must be approved by the Commerce Department, and some sales are approved over the objections of the Pentagon, he testified.

Rally to protest UMass' woes

By ED LEVINE
Collegian Staff

A rally to protest recent police activity, dormitory living conditions, the closing of the UMass library, and a myriad of other concerns will be held next Thursday, said Student Government Association co-director of communications Joel Weissman.

Weissman said the rally will be held at 12:30 p.m. on the Whitmore side of the Student Union building, in the field next to the library. He said several speakers will appear, addressing a variety of problems facing the UMass community.

Several concerns will be addressed at the rally, said Weissman, including the presence of so-called "SWAT Teams" in the Southwest and Sylvan residential areas this past weekend. According to observers, several officers were patrolling the halls of the dormitories in the area harassing residents and entering student rooms.

Weissman called such activity "an unacceptable violation of our rights" and pledged the SGA will "do everything in our power to see this stops."

Student Senate Speaker David Barenberg said he met yesterday with Vice-Chancellor for Student Affairs Dennis L. Madson who assured him there would be no police in the buildings this weekend unless they are called.

"We don't feel the students' interests are being represented by the administration," Weissman said, "and this is highlighted by the violence problem. Their solutions are patchwork quilt jobs."

Weissman said the SGA will call for the establishment of a student committee to monitor police activities. "We have no objection to increased police activity," he said, " but we don't want them walking around in the dorms unless they're called. We'd rather see more lighting and emergency call boxes around the campus."

Other issues to be addressed at the rally include the closing of the library, necessary renovations to dormitories, increased activities in residential areas, the proposed hike in housing and board fees, and violence against women and members of the Third World community, Weissman said.

Weissman also said affidavits are available for students to document cases of harassment or other violations by police officers this past weekend. He said the SGA urges all students who had problems with police in the dormitories last weekend to obtain the affidavits from their offices in the Student Union Building.

Women meet to discuss harassment

By JULIE EAGLE
Collegian Staff

"It's like a big, dark cloud looming over us, threatening all women," one unidentified woman said last night of campus sexual harassment during a 90-minute discussion of the problem.

The Campus Center discussion, headed by the Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy Women's Issues Team, drew almost 50 participants, five of them men.

Team members told the group they hope to establish a University grievance procedure for female students to publicize cases of sexual harassment by University employees. Such complaints would be aired before a student, administrative and faculty body empowered to fire offending employees, members said.

The team generated support from participants who pledged to gather information "that will have clout with UMass administrators" in getting them to approve a grievance procedure. Such information will include data from campus surveys asking women if they have been sexually harassed by University employees; data from similar nationwide surveys; a campuswide petition calling for such a procedure and affidavits from harassed UMass women.

If approved, team member Elli Bagli said the team will then ask UMass Legal Services for its assistance in implementing such a procedure. The team will also seek information from the University's Ombudsman's office, where workers are developing a procedure to handle a variety of student grievances, Bagli said.

Discussion participants all agreed sexual harassment of UMass women by male University employees is, indeed, "a common occurrance." Team member Mary Jane Pica cited a fall 1978 graduate women's survey which concluded such harassment of UMass women is not rare.

Just what constitutes sexual harassment, however, was a

Officials order end to roof repair on Gorman

By NORM WHITEHURST
Collegian Staff

UMass Physical Plant officials yesterday ordered work on the Gorman Dormitory roof to stop, according to Fred Winer, assistant cluster coordinator of Gorman.

"I ordered the contractor to stop work because the equipment they were using was faulty," said William Scheumann, Physical Plant Design Engineer. The kettles used to heat the tar for the roof were overheating, producing material that wouldn't last, Scheumann said.

Winer, who was on the roof when the work stopped, said the contractor wasn't worried about the overheated tar.

Scheumann said, "The contractor may not be worried but the manufacturer of the tar states that the material isn't any good after being overheated." Winer said there is a growing concern about what will happen this weekend with heavy rains forecasted.

"The contractor, Inter-City Roofing Company of Worcester, is responsible for the roof (repairs). They have put a waterproof material over the roof and that should hold back the water," said Scheumann. "But if something should happen, they will have to come immediately to repair the leak -- even if it's raining."

Inter-City Roofing Company could not be reached yesterday for comment.

Gorman residents have been meeting weekly with University Ombudsmann Robert Wellsman according to Winer.

"We've been told that the roof will be fixed in two weeks, but we've heard that before," he said.

Roof problems have plagued Gorman for two or three years now according to Winer.

"When students returned last spring, many rooms had been condemned by the University," said Winer. "Rooms were flooded and furniture had been destroyed."

Efforts by the University to evict the students failed and the students remain in the rooms today, despite visible water stains and caking plaster.

"The University had promised the roof to be fixed this September but the job was constantly put off," said Winer.

Third World community meets

By JAMES LEWIS, JR.
Black Affairs Staff

Between 50 and 60 members of Third World organizations on campus attended the New Africa House Steering Committee meeting held yesterday afternoon from 4:00 p.m. until 6:45 p.m. The meeting centered on a variety of issues, including the organization and definitive status and purpose of the steering committee, the role and accountability of the steering committee to the Department of Afro-Am, the role of the office of Cultural Affairs in relation to the Department of Afro-American Studies and the community of students, and the Director of the Cultural Center, Mr. Lewis Van Jackson.

Members from all segments of the Third World Community were present, but immediately after the meeting began, it became unclear to the purpose of the meeting. The ensuing confusion caused communication problems and people started leaving the meeting.

It was decided by the Department of the Afro-American Studies not to recognize any decision of the Steering Committee body on the grounds of the consensus that the Steering Committee has not defined itself as an entity, that is not being in any form functional.

Mr. Chester Davis, Professor in the Department of Afro-Am, informed members of the community that the Cultural Center is a part of the Afro-Am Department. Afro-Am handles their budget and that the Director of the Cultural Center, Mr. Van Jackson, is a member of the Afro-Am staff.

Mr. Davis said that the Steering Committee has, in the pst, served as an advisory to the Afro-Am Department.

Back in February, 1970, black students and faculty, numbering 200, took over the building. Davis said that the Steering Committee does not establish policy for this building on its own. In the past, the Steering Committee involved planning and implementing cultural activities in the building, determination of space use that isn't already spoken for, and also the committee is responsible for the physical upkeep of the building.

Among the many groups present were Ahora, Third World Women's Task Force, Nummo News, Black Affairs, Malcolm X Center, Center for Racial Understanding, Afrik-Am Society, Tony Crayton of Office of Third World Affairs, Asian American Student Association, Black Mass Communications Project, Drum, and interested persons.

Various groups expressed their concern for the direction of cultural events in the New Africa House. It was agreed to hold the next Steering Committee meeting next Tuesday.

"Prisms" - an intense tragedy

By KAREN THOMAS
Black Affairs Staff

It's not ordinary on a Saturday night to enter the Hampden Theatre and see a capacity crowd. Nor is it ordinary to be commanded to "wait here" and then told to "sit in that seat" by a prison guard. However, 'Prisms' proved not to be a very ordinary play.

The opening scene set the intensity that gripped one to the seat for the entire performance. Two prison guards (David Donabedian and Kevin Ball) enter leading a prisoner (Segun Eubanks) to an exit. In blood red paint that somehow had managed to drip, the sign read "Last Exit."

The prisoner struggled when he realized where he was going. A prisoner locked in a cell began to scream. He didn't cry our for justice nor for the freedom of the man. Instead he cried out "Take me instead!"

As if the drama was not heated enough, the audience sat there horrified as the prisoner was strapped to a chair and jerked to death while the other prisoners shouted.

The play continued to unfold the horrors of the lives of three prisoners; Booker (Eric Moreland), Bobby (Norman J. Lewis) and Tyrone alias "Whitey" (Waliyyudin Sharrif).

Booker explains how he killed an innocent little girl. One gathers from his speech that he has paid for this crime. He explains, "I said, get up little girl, get up." But the little girl did not get up and "a tear rolled down her face to the ground, escaping free." It seems as if that tear is the only thing that escapes free in the drama.

Perhaps Booker would be easier to accept if he wasn't portrayed as the unifying force for the three men. One wants to hate him, but can only respect him. When Bobby, a psychopathic killer who murdered his mother, claims he didn't hurt his mother and pulls a plastic knife from his pocket to defend his mother's name, it is Booker who holds him and says "It's going to be all right."

"Whitey" on the other hand, is the outcast of the three. He is favored by the guards. He has his papers delivered, letters and appeals come through for him to leave jail. "Whitey" has also murdered. He kills anyone he feels threatened him first. He explains that he has to do this in order to survive. It is Booker who points out that "Whitey" is afraid and kills anything he doesn't understand. Booker nicknames him "Whitey", because of the favor the guards bestow upon him.

The final events of the drama are overwhelming. Bobby is abused by the guards and Booker swears his revenge. "Whitey" wishes to take part in revenge, but Booker says "This is between me and Bobby." The guard is called and Booker grabs him into the cell. Ashuffle occurs and Whitey ends up choking the guard to death. Bobby wants to place the body beneath the blanket, where he keeps his imaginary dead, providing a nervous chuckle for the audience.

The guard's body is placed in the corridor and the prisoners return to their cells, waiting.

A guard returns and orders Bobby and Booker to pick marbles, since he realizes the two of them plotted the death of the guard. "Whitey" wants to play the game, but Booker doesn't allow him. Booker gives Bobby the strength to choose. "Just close your eyes Bobby, you can do it," he says. Bobby closes his eyes and Booker takes the black marble. When Bobby opens his hand he is holding the white marble. He cries in joy.

At this point the guard returns and Booker informs him of the results. "Whitey" is released from prison. Booker tried to break away and is shot and Bobby cries out in anguish.

The play ends in a soliloquy by Bobby. Over and over again he repeats that he "didn't mean to kiss him Mama." He slumps in the corner, the youth of our future, left to nothing but hopelessness and madness.

The most interesting thing about 'Prisms' is it was written and directed by Mascheri Chapple, a Smith College Theatre major. It is amazing that a young woman's view of prison life could be so potent and realistic. As I left the theatre I didn't know if I should smile at the work of art she created or cry because we live in a society that destroys the goodwill of mankind.

Cambodians' plight continues

SA KAEW, Thailand [AP] There is an unexpected sound among the sighing and coughing at the refugee hospital here -- the squall of newborn babies struggling for life in a world of the sick and dying.

At this camp jammed with 30,000 Cambodians the babies are born too weak, too thin, wizened like old men, many destined to die within days from the starvation and disease that sapped their mothers' strength.

Twenty infants were born in the camp's first week of operation, but many were doomed before their lives began. Some are born already suffering from malaria, transmitted through their mothers' bloodstreams, an unusual phenomenon observed by doctors here.

The newborns who do not survive are part of a daily death toll that fluctuates sharply -- 42 on Friday, 25 on Saturday -- in this camp 50 miles west of the Cambodian border.

Margaret Boothby, an Australian volunteer nurse at the makeshift hospital, said one baby died of malnutrition shortly after his birth this weekend. "I tried to help, but I was too late."

But she found another child -- and this, the smallest one in camp, may live.

"At first I thought it was just a pile of clothes," -- but when whe looked more closely at the pile of black cloth whe found a tiny, wrikled boy, his arms thinner than a woman's finger. He weighted little more than two pounds, but he has begun to gain a little and may be one of the survivors.

Mrs. Boothby tried to pull the tiny boy away, but his mother, 28-year-old Yang of Cambodia's Battambany province, clutched him to her and cried out, "Who's taking my baby?"

"I thought someone was trying to steal my baby," Yang said later from her place on a straw mat rolled out on the hospital's dirt floor.

She was half paralyzed from a stroke and grotesquely swollen from disease, lying there among the terribly emaciate patients. There are 2,000 people here seriously ill withmalaria, tuberculosis and the ever-present severe malnutrition.

Yang was too ill to feed her baby and nurse Boothby gave him hourly bottles.

He was the smallest baby in the camp, but Yang's son was older than the others who lay squalling around him. he was born 16 days ago in a Cambodian village three days before word went out that the Vietnamese soldiers were coming and the villagers fled.

The UMass Hunger Task Force will sponsor its annual Fast for Hunger day November 15, 1979. Students can donate their meal tickets November 13th, 14th, and until noon the 15th. In return for not eating on the 15th, for each meal ticket, 98 cents will go to OXFAM-America. OXFAM is originally British, but the organization is presently pulling a massive effort to aid the Cambodians, who are presently on the verge of extinction. Please help.

News Briefs

LONDON [AP] — Amnesty International charged that human rights in Pakistan have been "grossly violated" since a government decision to arrest most of the country's political leaders.

The London-based human rights group, which was awarded the 1977 Nobel Peace Prize, charged that since the decision was announced Oct. 16 there have been "at least 300 political arrests and a sharp increase in the number of cruel, inhuman and degrading punishments handed down by the country's military courts."

The government also imposed censorship, banned strikes, postponed elections indefinitely and ended reviews by civil courts of military court decisions.

Amnesty said the politicians were arrested "merely for being office bearers of opposition parties" and appealed to President Zia ul-Haq for their immediate release.

BANDUNG, Indonesia [AP] — At least 24 persons were killed and 160 others injured, 43 of them seriously, in last Friday's earthquake on the Indonesian island of Java, an official spokesman said Sunday.

A spokesman for the West Java governor's office said the quake, which measured 6.4 on the Richter scale, also damaged 1,700 homes when it hit West Java Friday night.

Ten persons were killed in the town of Garut and another 10 in Tasikmalaya, about 90 miles from the epicenter of the quake in the Indian Ocean.

Four persons were killed in the West Java capital of Bandung and in the towns of Ciribon and Ciamis, the spokesman said. He said those with serious injuries were being treated at West Java hospitals and clinics.

African exchange for summer

During the past 21 years, Operation Crossroads Africa Inc., a non-profit organization focusing on international development and educational exchange, has sent more than 5,000 volunteers (students, professionals and others) to 34 English-speaking and French-speaking African countries to spend the summer helping rural village communities. The projects involve art, architecture, archaeology, ethnomusicology, agricultural development, community development, tutoring, clinical medical work, health education, media development and construction of clinics, schools and community facilities.

This extraordinary experience provides a brief but intense immersion in traditional and modern African life and pushes individuals to reconsider basic attitudes, standards and beliefs in relation to people with contrasting values and beliefs. Most volunteers arrange to receive academic credit for their summer experience and may find that they are helped into professional careers in International Relations, Higher Education and Business.

Persons interested in participating in Crossroads Summer Work/Travel/Study Program should contact the committee for the Collegiate Education of Black Students (CCEBS) at their office in the New Africa House. The phone number is 545-0031. Interested persons may also contact Crossroads Africa Inc., 150-5th Ave., NY, NY 10011 (Phone 212-242-8850) topic on which participants differed.

Team members, in a group statement, said sexual harassment includes: verbal harassment or abuse; subtle pressure for sexual activity; sexist remarks about a woman's clothing, body or sexual activities; unnecessary touching; leering at a woman's body; brushing against a woman's body; demanding sexual favors by implied or overt threats concerning one's job, grades, letters of recommendations, etc. and physical assault

One unidentified woman asked the group if "sexual tension" between a student and her professor during an academic conference, for example, would constitute sexual harassment.

"I think you have to question whether a student is interpreting general tension between a student and a professor -- between a student and an authority figure -- as sexual. It could be a question of wrong interpretation. I think you can't equate the two -- sex and teaching," Westfield State Psychology professor Jack Szpiler said.

But, team member Margarat Reid said, "There are professors here who have harassed women repeatedly (by generating tension). If three different women have been bothered, it (a grievance), would be more effective."

Still, another unidentified woman wanted to know if a professor's "blatantly sexist" attitude would constitute sexual harassment. "What about the overtly sexist professor -- the near-mysogonist -- who doesn't want to sleep with you but hates you because you are a woman?"

"Women collectively get lower grades, excluded from favors and special projects and things like that," said Donna Meeks of the Everywoman's Center. "Of course these things happen in specific situations. I don't think it happens in every situation. After a while, though, when you can cite a number of specific examples that it (sexual discrimination) is happening consistantly," a student would have more clout in handling such a situation.

All the participants agreed publicizing the existence of sexual harassment at the University, will be the first step in decreasing the problem.

LOOK: IT'S NATIONAL LAMPOON'S NOVEMBER LOVE ISSUE

This issue of National Lampoon contains some pretty spicy material. Some people unused to such spicy humor had to drink glass after glass of water while reading the love issue.

You can learn alot about all kinds of love from the November issue. If you're really ignorant, you can learn one hell of a lot.

But don't take our word for it. Pick up a copy at your bookstore or newsstand today. And if you get some kind of a disease, don't blame us. You picked up the magazine. It's your fault.

High-pitched boycott

To the Editor:

The other night I saw a performance of "Just Friends of 1923," the new musical being put on by the UMass Music Theatre Guild. Well, frankly, I'm shocked at their portrayal of Arabian eunuchs as huge, slobbering, grunting hairy men. Some of my best friends are eunuchs—and none of them grunt and slobber. The authors of this show, Peter Niernezura, obviously has no sympathy for castrated males. If he were a eunuch would he be so quick to write blasphemous diatribe about such an abused, heckled segment of our society?

I doubt it.

I urge all eunuchs, and even people who aren't eunuchs, to picket the show for the good of all men.

Sincerely Peturbed

As the disc turns

To the Editor

As a woman who makes her living performing music, and sees first hand, the threat disco poses to live musicians, I'd like to comment on Chuck Edgarly's article, "Why Disco Sucks" (11/6/79).

§Mr. Edgarly, don't you think you came on a little strong? Are you a musician? If you are, surely you understand the musical technology involved in much "disco" music. If you aren't, then I question your ability to technically criticize something you don't understand.

Phyllis Wall

Beastly cartoon

To the Editor:

Rob Ranney's cartoon "Beast" in the Oct. 18 issue drew my attention. He pictured in his cartoon an Ugly Virgin. Implying that women who are virgins are virgins because they are ugly—not by choice.

In a book on sexism called The Lace Ghetto there is a reprint of a cartoon printed in the early 1900's. It pictures four suffragettes as Ugly Virgin Spinsters. Implying that women who wanted the right to vote were fighting for that right because they were too ugly to be wanted by a man.

It's a joy to be on a college campus again, and I am trying to believe that UMass has an enlightened population, but Rob you make it difficult. Cartoons give the public subliminal messages just like advertisements do. If on the college campus those subliminal messages lack responsibility—who is ever going to get the message.

And at least, Rob—be original.

Pissed

To the Editor

We are writing this letter in order to shed some light on the intolerable conditions of the third floor south bathroom in Baker dormitory. We feel that we have no choice but to take this action because the problem has existed for so long (since the beginning of the semester). The specific problems that exist are both sanitary and structural.

To our knowledge, the women's showers have not been cleaned more than a couple of times and between cleanings, have been utterly disgusting. Due to the infrequent cleanings, the shower drains are clogged and flooding occurs daily.

Out of the seven toilet stalls, only two have working doors (the other stalls have been without doors for at least one semester). Of the five remaining stalls, three have "doors" in the form of plastic shower curtains. With forty people using this bathroom, the need for privacy is hardly being met.

§Due to the week and a half absence of our "janitor," toilet paper has to be taken from a locked closet by students, not to mention the fact that the bathroom has not been cleaned at all in the past twelve days.

We would like to know why we must pay $397 a semester to live in a dorm where sanitary conditions are given little or no consideration. As paying residents of Baker dormitory, we have the right to expect that our bathroom will be cleaned on a regular basis and that the doors will be put on the toilet stalls.

§We seriously hope some action will be taken soon in order to alleviate this problem.

Julie and Tony: It's my turn

William Peirce

Now that my tenure as the Student Attorney General has terminated, I feel obligated to discuss some observations I have made about the Student Government Association. While an officer of the SGA, I witnessed an abundance of petty politics guided by the personal whims of certain members. These observations date back to my first days in the office of the Attorney General.

My initial appointment as acting Attorney General was for a three week period until a permanent replacement could be equitably screened and confirmed by the Senate. When the Senate rejected that appointment, I was subsequently reappointed as an acting Attorney General, however, I felt pressure from the Third World Caucus because I was "denying" Julie Robertson the office. After all, she was the most qualified; as she often told me.

Upon my return this September, I was again subject to this same unjustified discrimination. Not only had I placed "the" Attorney General in exile, but I was chastised for going to Washington to work in Congress for the summer. Julie Robertson, the "exiled" head of the judiciary, displayed her maturity by blowing Bronx cheers behind my back often and continuously espousing her distaste for my character and personality. I am very grateful to Julie for her assistance this summer in my absence as I have told her, but I cannot understand the rationale behind such behavior. I could not publicly state this at the times of their occurances because I would have been labelled as being political by my antagonists, but then again, my antagonists knew what "political" meant from their own personal ploys.

Further political remarks about my performance were outlined by Tony Crayton in his two articles printed in the Black Affairs section of the Collegian. The fact that these unfounded allegations appeared in the Black Affairs pages in itself reveals that these charges were guided by political motives. Mr. Crayton was quick to attack my record as the Attorney General because the Third World candidate had failed to gain the office.

Tony Crayton never gave me the courtesy of listening to my views prior to his two articles. This fact and others just indicates that the opinions he has expressed were blind and directed by political considerations. Hopefully, the new Attorney General will not be subject to this unjust display of yellow journalism.

Ann Bolger is a dedicated, highly qualified and well intentioned individual. I am confident that she will be worthy of the trust that has been placed in her by the Senate, and hopefully free from the abuse, the unfounded criticism and the personal attacks that I was forced to deal with.

I would like to express my extreme gratitude to those people in the Student Government Association who supported and assisted me during my tenure. It was a most fruitful experience. My only regret, however, is that the Office of Attorney General became too political in my term, but those who are voicing this complaint are the ones to blame. May the days of these personal attacks and accusations be a lesson for the future.

William Peirce was the acting student Attorney General this past term.

The yo-yo effect

Earl Dyer

I am so sick and tired of taking my daily run to the Campus Center to get the Daily Collegian to find the Editorial or letters to the editor section related to soap operas. "As Racism Turns," is how I define these back and forth writings.

Every single day you can depend on the sometime not true "facts" on this section of the paper. It is either Jew did this, or black did that. I feel that this aggrevates more of a problem, racism aggravating more racism. It is very obvious that there is racism existing all over. Even more existing on this campus. I know for a fact, as a black person, that the Jews are not the main oppressors of the blacks. There are many other people who are from some other race or ethnic background that are oppressing the blacks.

Jews, are part of the oppressing group "as whites." But, as stated above, Jews are not the only oppressors of blacks. Jews can be of any race. I must not only condemn the Collegian, but also Nummo News for this present situation. Nummo News should be a paper of learning and cultural aspects of the Third World society. It should not be used for the condemnation of other groups unless there is a good reason for it.

I feel Nummo News is a good sourceful paper yet it should also stop printing its so-called "facts" in the editorial section of the paper.

Editors of both papers, "Where the hell are you?"

Area governments talk police tactics

By ANDREA ATKINS
Collegian Staff

The police SWAT team went through Sylvan this weekend breaking up a "totally legal party" in Brown dormitory, according to co-president of Sylvan Area, David Cline.

Both Cline and Southwest Assembly co-President Scott Shuster said their areas will be looking to obtain documented evidence of harrassment by the police from area residents.

Both areas will receive help from the Undergraduate Student Senate, according to their respective presidents.

Reports of police in Southwest last weekend have angered residents there.

"I'm outraged at what is an obvious invasion of privacy," Cline said. He also called the presence of the police in Sylvan "harrassment."

In other business in area governments, Central President Paul Washburn said Steve Berkowitz was appointed coordinator of the Greenough Craft Shop which will be open in two weeks.

Washburn said the government also allocated $40 to Chadborne and $75 to Wheeler for coffee houses. The Central Area Government has also suggested that Dennis Doherty be appointed to the Central-Orchard Hill Residential Appeals Committee.

In Sylvan, Co-president Cline announced that the area's computer room is open. "Except for the $500 that the University Computing Center is giving, Sylvan Area is footing the bill (about $1,300) for the operation of the center," said Cline.

The Southwest Assembly passed three bills this week, according to Shuster. A request by John F. Kennedy Middle for $325 for a coffee house was tabled to the finance committee, Shuster said.

Shuster said $30 was allocated to finance a marketing and research project to "determine the needs and attitudes of Southwest

The SWA is sponsoring a party on November 15. Shuster said he expects less problems with this party than with the Southwest Halloween party because it will be on a weeknight and he doesn't expect a lot of visitors. The Halloween party was broken up by police because of large crowds, he said.

Northeast Area Government President Chris Decker said the government has been working on revising their constitution. Decker said the new constitution will give voting power to the groups supported by the area, like the area's Women's Center.

"We've made a commitment to change the government into a more progressive government," said Decker.

To save money, the government also voted to "cut down" some of the planned activities for the Winter Carnival in Northeast, according to Decker.

Shah offers to leave U.S.

NEW YORK(AP) – The deposed shah of Iran is willing to leave the United States in hopes of freeing Americans being held hostage in Iran, but his doctors say the move could kill him, a statement issued for the shah said yesterday.

The statement was released by Robert F. Armao, senior adviser to Shah Mohammad Reza Pahlavi. The former monarch is being treated for cancer at New York Hospital.

Attempts to interview the shah were rejected yesterdayas they have been in the past. "The family at this point wants to remain in seclusion," said Armao spokeswoman Chris Godek. She said there would be no elaboration on the statement.

Iran cuts oil exports by 5 percent

NEW YORK(AP)— Iran is cutting fourth-quarter crude oil deliveries to major oil companies worldwide by 5 percent retroactive to Oct. 1, spokesmen for the companies confirmed yesterday.

Word of the announcement by the National Iranian Oil Co. came from British Petroleum Co., Iran's largest customer, and from others including Exxon Corp., Ashland Oil Inc., Gulf Oil Corp., Shell Oil International and several large trading companies in Japan.

It was not immediately known if the cut represented a drop in oil production or the diversion of oil from contract sales to the more lucrative spot market, where oil prices are more than 50 percent higher.

"We were encouraged by the news," said Ashland spokesman Dan Lacey. 'It seems to imply they (the Iranians) intend to keep exports moving" after widespread reports suggested Iran may have halted oil shipments.

The Iranian government and national oil company have denied that exports ceased this week at the key Kharg Island oil port on the Persian Gulf, and U.S. government and industry spokesmen have said shipments are continuing.

The United States imports about 700,000 barrels of oil daily from Iran, 3.5 percent to 5 percent of U.S. consumption.

Despite the news of the cutback, wholesale home heating oil prices dropped sharply yesterday after two days of gains on volatile U.S. spot markets.

Heating oil rose 10 cents a gallon to 98 cents this week, but by yesterday afternoon, the price had slipped to 92 cents.

The impact of prices in the spot market — which includes transactions not covered by long-term contracts — on retail heating oil prices is hard to determine because of the small quantities that recently have been traded.

U.S. inventories of fuels used for home heating are 15 percent higher than a year ago, and analysts and government spokesmen have said heating oil supplies are ample for the winter.

The Iranian supply cut will be felt as a 7.5 percent reduction in oil shipments for the rest of 1979.

The spot market is said to comprise about 10 percent of the world oil trade and Iran, the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Coutries' third-largest member behind Saudi Arabia and Iraq, is said to be one of the cartel's largest spotmarket sellers.

In the spot market yesterday,one trader said his company agreed to buy 400,000 barrels of Libyan oil for $43.50 a barrel. The oil is destined for a U.S. Gulf Coast refinery.

OPEC's official top price is $23.50 a barrel, but Nigeria and other members are selling oil under contract at over $26.

GSS backs boycott

The Graduate Student Senate approved a motion Tuesday night to support the Farm Workers Union and to endorse their boycott against Red Coach Lettuce from California.

Don Ross, senate committee coordinator, spoke in favor of the UFW. He said student support can be very effective, and campus cooperation could benefit from approval by the Board of Governors to officially observe the boycott.

In other business, Armando Parces-Enriguez, senator from the Spanish and Portuguese Department, said the Five College Latin American Studies Council is looking for a Latin American individual to offer interdisciplinary courses and seminars.

The positions are open to any Latin American currently or recently working in Latin America who speaks English, he said. For more information, contact Parces-Enriguez in the Spanish and Portuguese Department in Herter.

TALKING HEADS:

Sunday concert will attract UMie cult following

Currently on a national tour, new wave band Talking Heads is stopping here Sunday night to perform at the Fine Arts Center Concert Hall. Last year the reception the band received at Bowker Auditorium showed that UMies are part of the cult following this unique band. To preview the sold-out concert, music critic Steve Winniman here reviews their latest album.

By STEVE WINNIMAN
Collegian Staff

On Fear of Music, the Talking Heads' third and best album, songwriter David Byrne says it's not just nukes, muggers, and politicians who are taking over, it's everything—air, animals, and even guitars. And in the song, "Life During Wartime," Byrne says if we don't hide somewhere, we're going to get it sooner or later.

Maybe only Byrne will get it. Byrne is the eccentric lead guitarist, lead singer, and songwriter for Talking Heads, which also includes Jerry Harrison on guitar and keyboards; Tina Weymouth on bass; and Chris Frantz on drums.

Most of Talking Heads' material stems from Byrne's strange feelings and impressions of the modern world. On the group's two previous albums, Byrne perceived the world as mechanical and emotionless—a barren, cold existence based on pure logic and devoid of any real human feeling. Yet the humor and originality of the music kept it both interesting and fun.

Now, on Fear of Music, Byrne offers insight into his paranoid feelings. On "Air," he sings, "What is happening to my skin/Where is my skin/Where is the protection that I needed/Air can hurt you too." In "Life During Wartime," he invokes an image of fearfully living in an apartment during an armed conflict. And in "Animals," he sings, "They're setting a bad example/They have untroubled lives/They think everything's nice/They like to laugh at people."

Yet these jolly thoughts are set to some of the most exciting and original music to be heard in recent memory. The sounds on Fear of Music range from hard-rocking to typical Talking Heads weirdness, with one song, "I Zimbra," sounding like a far-Eastern religious chant. Byrne's high, disembodied voice weaves around the other instruments, sometimes going out of pitch, then rhythmically back in.

As always, the instrumental work is faultless. Harrison fleshes out Byrne's brittle voice and guitar with his skillful keyboards and sometimes guitar. And the rythym section of Weymouth and Frantz is strong and powerful. On a couple of cuts, the beat gets slightly monotonous, almost approaching a disco beat, but in no way does it detract from the musical quality.

Producer Brian Eno adds some backing vocals and synthesizers, while continuing in the full, lush production style that worked so well on the band's second album, More Songs About Buildings and Food, which Eno also produced.

Spikers downed by Yale

By MAUREEN SULLIVAN
Collegian Staff

The women's volleyball team was bested by Yale University Tuesday night, 15-10, 15-9, 13-15, 9-15, 12-15, at New Haven.

According to UMass coach Elaine Marasco, the Minutewomen were in command throughout the match, "especially during the first two games. In the third game, we were waiting for Yale to give us the ball, instead of going for the ball ourselves. We were flat in game four, and in the last game, we lost a 12-7 lead.

"We lost three matches we should've won -- Springfield College, Southern Conn., and Yale. I think it's because we don't have true competitive spirit; we play well, we go ahead, but we don't go all the way. Next year, when UMass starts playing in more tournaments, I believe this spirit will start to really show, and UMass will become the team to beat."

The Minutewomen will go to Worcester this weekend as the top seed in the Mass. State Championships. Hosted by Clark University, the UMass squad will play Northeastern University at 5:00 Saturday night.

UMass finished off the regular season with a 19-7 record, including two wins over UConn, a victory over Regional entrant Providence College, last year's Mass. State champion Boston College, and the University of Bridgeport.

Sports notices

Ultimate Frisbee— The Northeastern Ultimate Frisbee Championships will be held Nov. 10 starting at 9:30 and Nov. 11 beginning at 11:00. Frisbee action goes until dark on both days.

Correction— There will be an intersquad gymnastic meet this Saturday in the Boyden Auxillary Gym at 4:00 p.m., not in Curry Hicks cage as previously reported.

NOW YOU CAN EARN OVER $6,500 WITH ARMY ROTC.

Before you graduate from college! Because now, you can combine service in the Army Reserve or National Guard with Army ROTC. It's called the Simultaneous Membership Program (SMP). And, depending on your academic year when you enter, SMP can help you earn over $6,500.

Here's how it works. If you qualify and a vacancy is available, you become a member of an Army Reserve or National Guard unit as an officer trainee and, at the same time, enroll in the Army ROTC advanced course at your college. Your Reserve or Guard membership will pay you at the minimum level of Sergeant E-5, and you'll receive $100 a month during the regular school year as an Army ROTC advanced course cadet.

At the end of your second year of advanced ROTC, you'll be commissioned a second lieutenant and, assuming there's a vacancy, serve with a Guard or Reserve unit while you complete the requirements for your college degree. Upon graduation, you may continue service with a Guard or Reserve unit while pursuing your civilian career, or you can, if you prefer, compete for active duty as an Army officer.

So if you'd like to earn over $6,500 while you're still in college, get into SMP. Because SMP can help you do it. You can bank on it!

For further information, contact the Professor of Military Science at your school.

Women battle Yale in Eastern Regionals

By MIKE ESTRADA
Collegian Staff

Blame the snow for the situation facing the UMass field hockey team tomorrow.

The Minutewomen meet their first round Eastern Regional opponent Yale, a bit prematurely, at NOPE at 12:00 in a game that was postponed on October 10 during a freak snowstorm, tied at 1.

Despite what the respective coaches say or are willing to admit, tomorrow's game should provide at least some indication of how the two teams will fare when they next meet in the context of tournament play next Friday in Springfield.

The Bulldogs bring to town their 8-5-1 record and the less than secure knowledge that they will have to play above and beyond themselves to top UMass on the astroturf next week. But then, anything can happen in a tournament.

"UMass is stronger than us," admits Yale coach Richard Cantwell. "When you get down to it, any team in the top eight can win."

Coach Pam Hixon's 10th ranked nationally, 14-2-1 Minutewomen have no ace-in-the-hole against Yale tomorrow or next Friday except the raw talent up and down the lineup. The Bulldogs' top scorers, Brenda Hamm and Christie Littlejohn, have ten goals apiece.

UMass has two veritable goal scoring machines in their two All-American forwards Laura O'Neil and Judy Strong. O'Neil, by virtue of her duo-tally against BU has 15 goals, sophomore Strong has netted 16. Hixon has expressed desires to win tomorrow's game but has given her team over to work on the man-to-man defense (not seen by UMass all year) employed by Yale.

"We've got to work on some things but we'll hold something back for the tournament," Hixon said. "The Yale game (tomorrow) will be no indication of how the winning team will do in the tournament, that is a whole new season."

Wednesday night's game against BU on the astroturf gave some insight as to how UMass can play on the artificial surface. The ball tends to roll truer and faster, much different than the rough surface at NOPE. The stickers passing on the turf was superb against a team that has played on the surface all year. Equally superb was the goalkeeping of senior Robin Jennings, who recorded her third shutout of the season. Jennings, who shares goalkeeping duties with junior Karen Stifter, saw only limited action last year; just another indication of the versatility with which Hixon has to work.

Chiefs scalp booters,

By DAVE BRADLEY

A charged up Springfield College soccer team pleased a cheering home crowd of about 500 by handing UMass a 1-0 loss Wednesday night on the astroturf at Benedem Field.

The goal was scored at the 22:34 mark of the second half. Springfield back Bruce Forbes took control of the ball at about the 40 yard line to the left of Minutemen goalie Mark Marilla and fed a nice pass to forward Bob Wheble cutting down the middle. Wheble took the ball in and quickly parked a twenty-footer past Marilla's right shoulder into the back of the net. There was little Marilla could do as the pass freed Wheble from the UMass defense, leaving the netminder in a one-on-one situation.

To blame the loss on the fact that UMass players aren't familiar with astroturf would be doing a disservice to Springfield. Minutemen couch Russ Kidd admited Springfield "worked hard" and "hustled" for the win. But to ignore the astroturf factor would also be a mistake.

"We just don't play well on astroturf," Kidd said after the game. "We would have killed them on grass."

And it wasn't as though the Minutemen were crippled by the astroturf, which allows the ball to skim across the field easier and bounce more than on grass. Indeed, after the first half in which the ball seemed to bounce from one end of the field to the other, UMass looked as though it was ready to take control of the game in the second half and drill the opposition's net.

In the first minute of the second stanza UMass forward Tony Dias collected a ball off the foot of teamate Ed Eschmann for a hard shot from about 10 yards out. Minutes later Wayne Moran shot one just wide to the goalie's right from 25 yards away after being set up by a pass from Scott Cooper.

With 18 minutes gone in the half, Eschmann teamed up with Dias on some nice passing to send Eschmann in close and force Springfield goalie Tom Ferreri to come sliding out of his net. Eschmann couldn't get a good shot off and the ball rolled wide.

UMass continued to apply pressure as Vince Foti took a pass from Cooper and streaked down the right side unmolested. The ball got too far ahead of him though and he had to coral it and ended up sending it back to the middle of the field.

In the midst of this pressure, Springfield scored its goal and UMass could not recapture its momentum.

Final home game

Minutemen battle Crusaders

By STEVE ZACK
and GEORGE O'BRIEN
Collegian Staff

This Saturday marks the last time that a football game will take place in Alumni Stadium this year as the Minutemen close out their home season against the Crusaders of Holy Cross, coached by Neil Wheelwright.

Last year, the Minutemen humiliated the Crusaders in front of Holy Cross' own fans by a lopsided score of 33-8, with Dennis Dent picking up 203 yards rushing on the afternoon. The lifetime series between the two teams shows Holy Cross with a slight edge, 14 wins to the Minutemen's 12 with four ties.

On the season, the Crusaders are 3-5, having just come off of a 16-7 loss to Boston University, which the Minutemen downed earlier in the year, 20-6.

"We are struggling a little bit but we still think we can have a winning season," commented Holy Cross' Wheelwright. "We've had a hard time after losing our starting quarterback three weeks into the season."

The UMass offense is led by the passing of Mike McEvilly, 76 for 151 passing for 1,037 yards and five touchdowns, Catch all the action of Minutemen football this Saturday at 1:00 when UMass takes on Holy Cross. Howie Sobolov and Tim Wasserman describe the action on WMUA, 91.1 FM. The pregame show with Jim Mullins begins at 12:30.

halfback Cliff Pedrow, 111 carries for 382 yards, and flanker Kevin O'Connor, 27 catches for 450 yards and three touchdowns.

UMass is attempting a comeback from its 24-0 setback against the UConn Huskies two weeks ago; a loss which ended the Minutemen's chances for a playoff berth in Division 1-AA.

The loss came as a result of a multitude of UMass mistakes which the Huskies turned into points. The loss also ended the team's hope for an undisputed claim to the Yankee Conference crown. Should BU defeat UConn this weekend and the Minutemen down UNH two weeks hence, BU and UMass would finish tied for the YanCon crown. Should UConn pull out a victory over BU, the Huskies could wind up without a conference loss, making them the league champs.

This Saturday's game will also mark the end of an era, the Richard Page era. Dick Page has been UMass Sports Information Director for 22 years, and has decided to retire, effective sometime next August. This will be the last home football game for Page who has missed but one of the 73 football games played at Alumni Stadium and only two of the 211 games UMass has played since he took over in Sports Information back in 1958.

Page, who has covered a wide variety of sports in his tenure as sports information director, both here and at Springfield College where he served for eight years, considers football his favorite sport. All tolled, the Bennington Vermont native has covered 284 varsity football games in a profession he has always considered "more fun than work."

Page, who said his years at Amherst "have been extremely enjoyable and professionally very rewarding," plans to reture in August and move down to Florida with his family.

Due to Eastern Standard Time, the game will start at 1:00.

The Minutemen will be playing their last home game of the season this Saturday at 1:00 as they take on the Crusaders of Holy Cross. Last year the Minutemen romped to a 33-8 win in Worcester. (Staff photo by John Bunting).

Women booters in playoffs

By MAUREEN SULLIVAN

Top-seeded UMass will face UConn today at noon, in the opening round of the EAIAW women's soccer championships at Brown University.

The weekend-long tourney features some of the best teams from around the Northeast; they include Penn State, Harvard, Vermont, Cortland State, and Brown.

In the regular season, the Minutewomen posted a 12-1-1 record, including six shutouts (with a streak of five games in which UMass didn't allow a goal) and four one-goal victories. Only a 1-1 tie with Plymouth State at season's beginning and a 6-2 loss to Vermont in early October marred an otherwise impressive record.

UMass scored 57 goals, while allowing their opponents to strike 16 times. Natalie Prosser leads the Minutewomen offense with 13 goals (tallied up to the Smith game last week); Nina Holstrom, Elaine Contant, and Angie Cauoette have also contributed to the UMass scoring machine with at least two goals apiece.

After their loss to Vermont, UMass tightened up a previously loose midfield that "didn't get to the ball as often as they should" (according to coach Arnie Morse). Against a tough Cortland State squad, the Minutewomen kept the ball away from their speedy opposition; this midfield, led by Karen Keough and Nina Holstrom, helped UMass to get back on its feet with an important 6-2 win.

This defense continued to dominate throughout midseason, as they held five straight opponents (Mount Holyoke, Brown, Williams, Dartmouth, and Yale) scoreless, while they assisted the UMass offense by opening up crucial spaces around the field. A network of good passing, stealing, and feeding kept the ball in UMass hands (excuse me, feet) and away from opponents.

Even when the opposition managed to get within striking distance of the UMass goal, they were stopped by the UMass goaltending squad, led by Kelly Tuller.

UMass' most important game was against Harvard last October 30. The Crimson sought revenge for a loss last year that cost Harvard their number one standing in New England. After regulation ended, the Minutewomen and the Crimson were deadlocked 3-3. Five minutes into sudden death overtime, UMass scored. The Minutewomen came away with a 4-3 win and a guaranteed spot in the Easterns.

"Everyone will be after us," said UMass assistant coch Rick Zanini. "We're the number one team, plus most of the other teams in the tourney want to get us back for beating them in the regular season. UConn is a much improved team since we beat them last September. This tourney is going to be tough.

Harriers to compete in Boston

By JANE WOLFSON
Collegian Staff

"Our whole season has been geared for this race," said harrier captain Rick Walls, referring to tomorrow's qualifying for the Nationals being held at Boston's Franklin Park, at 12:00.

UMass will be one of 14 teams competing over the 6.2 mile course. The winning three teams will then travel to Lehigh University to compete in the Nationals next weekend.

The other teams racing this weekend will be, Providence College, Boston University, the number one and two ranked teams in New England, according to the latest coaches poll. The Yankee Conference teams, UMaine, UNH, URI, UCONN, and the University of Vermont. Also competing will be Boston College, Northeastern, and the Ivy League schools, Harvard, Dartmouth, Yale and Brown.

"Our chances for qualifying aren't as good as some of the others," explained Walls. "But, physically we're as ready as we're ever going to be. Everyone is healthy, we have the potential to run excellently."

Running for the Minutemen will be Walls, seniors, Paul Kirksey and Steve MacDougall, juniors, Bob Martin, Kevin Molteni, and Mike Doiron, and sophomore Paul Beaulieu.

"We're really ready and fully capable of qualifying," said MacDougall. But everyone's going to have to run their best race."

Other runners to watch for in tomorrow's race are, Providence College's sophomore All-American Ray Treacy,along with teamates Peter Crooke and Larry Reed, both seniors, Harvard's John Murphy and Reed Eichner, Northeastern's All-American Bruce Bickford, New Hampshire's Gary Crossan, and Maine's Peter Brigham.

Providence and BU are expected to take the top two spots, according to Friar coach Bob Omatto. "I'm pretty sure we'll run neck and neck with BU," said Omatto. "There's going to be a tough fight for that third spot, though, it could be either UMass, Harvard, Northeastern, UNH, or possibly UConn. It just depends on who has a good day," he concluded.

The Nationals next weekend will be the last cross country event for this fall season. The winter track season will begin on Dec. 1 with a dual meet against UConn and Seton Hall at UConn.

The UMass junior varsity football team will attempt to up their winning mark to 4-1 Sunday afternoon, when they square off against rival New Hampshire at 1 p.m. Although it is still not definite, the coaching staff reports that the game will be played at Alumni Stadium.

UMass will come out against New Hampshire with the same style of aggressive offense that has paced them to victories over Milford Academy, (23-21), AIC, (30-20), and Connecticut, (23-7).

Led by first year quarterback Dean Pecevich, and backs Mark Piccirillo, Steve Savard, and Dave Hietala, UMass will have to ignite a powerful surge on offense, as the UNH defense has allowed only 17 points in three contests.

The Minutemen will be without the services of Rich Jenkins, who suffered a knee injury in last Sunday's game with UConn, and will be out for eight weeks.

New Hampshire comes into Amherst with a 1-2 total, losing to Connecticut 7-0 and Maine 3-0, while beating Bridgeton Academy, 28-7.

Carter bans Iran oil imports

By ROBERT B. CULLEN
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Carter halted oil imports from Iran yesterday, declaring that America will not bow to economic pressure or terrorism in its efforts to protect "the lives of our people" held hostage at the U.S. Embassy in Tehran.

Carter said he was cutting off Iranian oil imports, which account for at least four percent of daily American consumption, "to eliminate any suggestion that economic pressures can weaken our stand on basic issues of principle."

He said the Iranians who have held the embassy and 60 Americans hostage since Nov. 4 are trying "to force unacceptable demands on our country."

The students occupying the embassy have demanded that the United States surrender the deposed Shah Mohammad Reza Pahlavi for trial as a war criminal. The shah is hospitalized in New York for cancer treatment.

The president said it is vital to the United States and the world that diplomatic personnel be protected, "and that we refuse to permit the use of terrorism and the seizure and the holding of hostages to impose political demands."

In his statement, nationally broadcast from the White House press room, Carter said, "No one should underestimate the resolve of the American government and the American people in this matter."

He then ordered a ban on the purchase of "any oil from Iran for delivery to this country." He said the move must be part of an international effort to secure release of the American hostages.

In announcing the ban on Iranian oil, Carter warned that his action will present a "real challenge" to the nation and will test American strength and determination.

He said he has asked the Energy Department to develop conservation measures and promised to work for fair and equitable distribution of short fuel supplies.

The White House is considering asking the nation's governors to attend a meeting in Washington this week where President Carter would discuss conservation steps that would reduce oil consumption.

Carter said, "America does face a difficult task and a test. Our response will measure our character and our courage. I know that we Americans will not fail."

He praised Americans for their restraint, despite scattered anti-Iranian incidents across the country.

He urged Americans to keep calm "despite the intensity of our emotions."

Lawyer says 'SWAT' teams may be illegal

By ED LEVINE
Collegian Staff

The presence of so-called "SWAT Teams" in dormitories in the Southwest and Sylvan residential areas last weekend may be a violation of the civil rights of residents of those dormitories, according to UMass Legal Services Office Attorney Charles DiMare.

The 1st amendment guarantees the right to peacefully assemble, the right to privacy and the right of free association.

—Attorney Charles DiMare

Police officers, said to be calling themselves the "SWAT Team," patrolled the halls of buildings in the two areas last weekend harassing students, according to several witnesses. DiMare said he thinks these patrols are in violation of the first and fourth amendments of the United States constitution.

The first amendment, DiMare said, guarantees the right to peacefully assemble, the right to privacy, and the right of free association.

He said the fourth amendment protects against unreasonable searches and seizures. "Usually more than 75 percent of such cases require a search warrant," he said.

DiMarre cited two exceptions to the fourth amendment which would exempt the requirement of a search warrant. The first, the "plain view doctrine" allows an officer to seize property or arrest an individual if he sees something in plain view in an area the officer is entitled to be in. DiMare questioned whether the doctrine would apply in this case, because he doubts the legality of police presence in the hallways of the dormitories.

"Residential Assistants and Heads of Residence can call the police in a situation they can't handle," he said, "and if the police see something in an open room, then it would be okay to seize the property or make arrests. However, if they are not called in, and are walking indiscriminately, especially

Teacher evaluations causes controversy

By DAVID LACHANCE
Collegian Staff

The administration stated that data based on "all available student evaluations" should be kept in faculty members' files and used in the evaluation of teachers for personnel actions, in a memo issued by the Provost's office last week.

The Massachusetts Society of Professors, however, the union representing the university faculty, has stated that "anonymous or unattributable material," including unsigned student evaluations, should not be used in personnel decisions or kept in teachers' files, in an October 3 memo.

The Academic Affairs Committee of the Undergraduate Student Senate stated that student evaluations are "an essential, but currently mishandled aspect" of personnel decisions, in an editorial in the Course and Teacher Evaluation Guide released last week.

The disagreement between the administration and the MSP stems from two apparently contradictory documents. The Academic Policy Manual, issued by the UMass Board of Trustees, guarantees students "the opportunity to participate in the personnel process, through contributing to the evaluation of a faculty member's effectiveness, particularly in teaching."

The same document also says that "the (faculty member's) basic file shall contain...appropriate evaluations of teaching effectiveness, including, but not limited to, those of students."

The contract between the administration and the MSP states that "no anonymous materials shall be placed in the official personnel file."

Acting Associate Provost Robert Sleigh Jr. said the faculty and the administration have "reached an impasse," and the memos issued were just "posturing" by the two parties.

Sleigh said, "The administration has a sincere interest in good evaluations, and so does the faculty," and called for a meeting of student, faculty and administration representatives to work out a solution.

MSP President Jules Chametzky said the October 3 memo was an attempt at solving "basic ambiguities," and that the MSP Executive Board, which issued the memo, is thinking of revising it in light of new considerations.

"We recognize that student evaluations are a valid part of evaluating teaching," Chametzky said, but they must be "as rational and objective as possible."

Chametzky said some teachers fear that the evaluations can be misused by personnel committees, by misinterpreting them or taking quotes out of context. Chametzky also said the current evaluations have "no firm standards for judgment," and that they are "imprecise and subject to abuse."

Chametzky's criticisms were echoed by Michael Murphy and Peter Egan, members of the Academic Affairs Council of the Student Seante and editors of this semester's Course and Teacher Evaluation Guide.

Murphy said a "guaranteed common ground" for evaluations and a standardization of evaluation procedures would improve the quality of the evaluations, and make them more useful and less subject to possible abuse.

King's lobster lunches legal?

BOSTON(AP)— Massachusetts' House Republican leader says his staff is checking to see if the lobster and crabmeat lunches on Gov. Edward J. King's expense account violate state law.

Rep. William G. Robinson, RMelrose took King to task for making the state pay for $100- and-up dinners for himself and state troopers assigned to guard him. Robinson said he would turn any evidence of improprieties over to the attorney general's office.

Details of the expenditures were released late last week in response to a request under the Freedom of Information Act.

"It's been common knowledge that he lives high off the hog and this is exceedingly difficult for the average person to understand," Robinson said.

"He wants us to tighten our belts while he loosens his."

Nursing board defends licenses

BOSTON(AP)— A spokeswoman for the state Board of Registration of Nursing claims the panel was within the law when it granted nursing licenses to applicants who had not passed the national licensing exam.

The Boston Globe reported several nurses received certification even though they failed the test or failed to meet other requirements.

But board Chairwoman Ann Hargreaves said the board has the right to license anyone it considers qualified.

Reagan to join presidential race

BOSTON(AP)—Ronald Reagan prepared yesterday to launch his third campaign for the Republican presidential nomination as other candidates of both parties fanned out to court voters in the East, the South and the Midwest.

Protests for hostages in Iran upstage Vet Day parades

BOSTON(AP)— The plight of American hostages in Iran overshadowed Veterans Day celebrations in Massachusetts, as marches in several cities included mention of some 60 U.S. citizens held captive at the U.S. embassy in Tehran.

Some 30 persons gathered across the street from a Post Office in Brockton yesterday,waving signs and shouting slogans of support for the hostages.

A number of passing motorists joined the demonstrators, who chanted: "Show your support for the hostages," and "Free our Americans from the tyranny of the Ayatollah."

The demonstrators included a number of local Veterans of Foreign Wars commanders who came to Brockton from parades in neighboring communities.

"We're fed up with what's happening to America in the foreign situation," said Ron Villareale, 33, of Brockton, organizer of the demonstration. But he added: "We don't want to cause anything that will endanger the hostages."

Villareale, who described himself as "a working man," said he was inspired to organize the demonstration by California Gov. Edmund G. Brown Jr.

The presidential candidate said Sunday that Americans should "walk and pray" to show their support for the American hostages.

Many communities, including Boston, held Veterans Day celebrations on Sunday. A number of veterans attending a parade in Boston told the*Boston Herald American*that they were concerned about the situation in Iran.

"The leadership should have seen it coming," Brad Burns, a Marine veteran of Vietnam, said of the embassy takeover.

Gas, oil price may be hiked by boycott

BOSTON (AP) — The U.S. boycott of Iranian oil could lead to a "surge" in the prices of both heating oil and gasoline prices, Massachusetts energy resources director Joseph S. Fitzpatrick warned yesterday.

However, Charles H. Burkhardt, executive director of the New England Fuel Institute, took a more optimistic view, saying America's record inventories of heating oil will help hold the price of that fuel in check.

"If any product is going to be hit, I suspect it would be gasoline," said Burkhardt, whose trade group represents several hundred oil dealers.

Their comments came in response to President Carter's order yesterday that the United States halt purchases of oil from Iran in retaliation for the seizure of the American embassy in Tehran Nov. 4.

Both Fitzpatrick and Burkhardt agreed the U.S. has enough oil on hand to take care of New England's heating needs through the winter. However, the two differed in assessing how the loss of Iranian oil would eventually affect retail prices.

"In terms of supply, there should be no difficulty," Fitzpatrick said. "The principal problem will be one of price."

Up until now, Fitzpatrick said, he had hopes that Massachusetts heating oil prices might stabilize at the 85-to-90 cent-a-gallon level for the rest of the winter.

Now, however, Fitzpatrick said he anticipates a "real surge in heating oil and gasoline prices" as the winter wears on. He said "real difficulties" may develop by spring because the Iranian cut-off coincides with production cutbacks planned after the first of the year by Nigeria, Algeria and Kuwait.

Burkhardt, on the other hand, emphasized America's lessened dependence on Iranian oil.

He said the United States is presently importing about eight million barrels of oil a day and only 700,000 barrels of that comes from Iran. Before the shah's overthrow, the Iranian imports ranged from two million to three million barrels a day, he said.

Ayatollah Khosrowshahi, a prominent member of the revolutionary council in Iran, visits the U.S. embassy in Tehran yesterday under heavy guard. He urged the Iranian students holding American hostages not to be frightened by warnings of an oil boycott. (AP Laserphoto)

TALKING HEADS:

Concert packs 'em in

By JIM MORAN
Collegian Staff

Talking Heads, the highbrow quartet of the new wave genre, played to an enthusiastic crowd of approximately 2,000 Sunday night at the Fine Arts Center, collecting two encores and solidifying their reputation as the best American band to evolve from the punk rock movement.

The group opened their generous 15-song set with a "true to original" version of "Artists Only," from the "More Songs about Buildings and Food" album, following up with "Stay Hungry." Next came seven selections from their most recent album -- "Fear of Music," which included an extended and highly-instrumentalized working of "Cities."

Another tune performed, which especially demonstrated their brilliant capacity for live performance, was "Heaven." Despite the noticeable absence of the echo-chamber from the studio version, lead singer David Byrne's high-pitched voice added an almost-ghostly effect.

Perhaps the most definitive statement of artistic freedom came next, with an especially tense version of "Electric Guitar." Politics could certainly be interpreted in the lyrics to this piece. Ever since Elvis Presley swung his gyrating hips in the 50s, through the drug-induced mood of 60s and 70s music, rock has been perceived as a corruptible force by the more reactionary elements of our society. And "Electric Guitar" may be a response to this year's ban of all but religious music in Iran: "Electric guitar gets run over by a car on the highway/This is a crime against the state/This is the meaning of life/To tune this electric guitar."

Other tunes done by the group were "Love Goes to Building on Fire," their first demo single and the obligatory "Psycho Killer," from their "Talking Heads '77" album. "Killer" was the only number done from their first album, and a lack of any new material proved a bit detrimental. But the audience seemed satisfied with their psychotic hit which Byrne has taken to a point of mockery, as evidenced by his stiff movements, his quavering intonations and the lengthy instrumental intro with guitarist/percussionist Jerry Harrison.

The encore featured their popular cover of Al Green's "Take Me to the River," and a neat little dance tune called "Life During Wartime," their new single. The latter seemed to be almost a statement of their progression and a departure from their punk roots: "This ain't no Mudd Club or C.B.G.B.,/I ain't got time for that now." Despite its protestations, the song has a disco flavor.

Only words of praise could be given to bassist Tina Weymouth and her husband, drummer Chris Frantz. Weymouth maneuvered her instrument like a snake, wrapping her fingers around its oversized neck.And Frantz was in sinc with the group every step of the way.

Opening the show was the San Francisco-based Pearl Harbor and the Explosions. The group was pleasant enough for an opener, but their lead vocals seemed overpowered by the music. Especially nice, however, was bassist Jimmy Stench's melodic backup vocals and the three-part harmonies of the lead singer, Stench, and lead guitarist. Tunes performed included "Drivin'," and "Release It," from their single, and a good cover of "Black Slacks."

Smith celebrates Margaret Sanger's life work

By ANN FARIS
Collegian Staff

Smith College will commemorate the 100th anniversary of the birth of Margaret Sanger, a leader in the American birth control movement, today and tomorrow.

The conference, sponsored in part by a grant from the National Endowment for the Humanities, will focus on the life and work of Sanger.

The staff of The Sophia Smith Collective, a women's history archive at Smith, have organized panel discussions and an exhibition of some of Sanger's personal documents.

"It is fitting that we honor Margaret Sanger by exploring current dimensions of reproductive freedom for women, for which she went to jail and to which she devoted her life," said Dorothy Green, conference coordinator, last week.

The Sophia Smith Collective has a large collection of Sanger's work, second only to that of the Library of Congress. The exhibit at the Neilson Library at Smith displays some of her books and pamphlets on birth control as well as letters, awards and items from her travels.

Panel discussions will focus on the impact that Sanger's struggle for birth control rights has today. Judith Levin, counselor for the American Civil Liberties Union, will open the conference today with a speech on "Reproductive Freedom and the Law."

"Other topics for discussion include, "Sex Education: the Continuing Controversy," "From Voluntary Motherhood to Planned Parenthood: Perspectives on the Birth Control Movement in America," and "The Politics of Population Planning." The PBS film "The Woman Rebel" about Margaret Sanger will be shown both days.

Smith College awarded Sanger an honorary degree in 1942. It was the only college ever to do so. This and her close friendship with a Smith alumna resulted in her leaving some manuscripts with the Sophia Smith Collection.

"We have very up-to-date sources of information about her work," Green said. "And we are still receiving some documents through her family."

Fund control may return to students

By ED LEVINE

Undergraduate Student Speaker David Barenberg said he met with Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs Dennis L. Madson last week and that they reached a partial agreement on allocations of the Student Activities Trust Fund.

Barenberg said Madson had agreed to allow for the deletion of exact dollar requirements by the trustees for the SATF, except (in the case of) Area Governments. The trustees have said they will allow revision of their funding requirements.

The UMass Board of Trustees, the primary governing body of the university, had issued a program statement which required set amounts from the $84 per student tax to be set aside for various organizations. Among the requirements are funds to be set aside for such programs as the Union Program Council, Distinguished Visitors Program, bus system, area governments, Student Activities Office, and a deficit liquidation fund.

Barenberg said the SGA wants the dollar figures eliminated from the trustees statement to allow the SGA to allocate the funding themselves, which he claims the SGA has always done.

He said further meetings would be held with Madson in an attempt to determine the fate of area government allocations.

Barenberg also said Madson had assured him no police patrols would be conducted in dormitories in the future. He said Madson guaranteed the police would enter the buildings only if called.

Last weekend police were reported to have been patrolling within dormitories in the Southwest and Sylvan residential areas. Residents and staff reported police harassment of many individuals, by officers calling themsleves the "SWAT Team."

Censorship accepted in Poland

By PETER SMERDON
Collegian Staff

"Journalists in Poland have an inner censor as well as the actual one, a psychological phenomenon, which means that you know what can and cannot be printed," said Polish journalist Daniel Passent, Thursday. "Each journalist has to decide for himself whether he wants to avoid being censored altogether or whether to try to broaden the limits of what can be printed," he said.

Passent, who is spending this year studying at Harvard as a Nieman Fellow, is a columnist and member of the editorial board of the Warsaw weekly Polityka. He lectured to 35 people in Thompson Hall on "What It Means to be a Journalist in Poland," under the sponsorship of the UMass Department of Slavic Languages and Literatures.

In practice it is the managing editor and censor who, by reading every newspaper edition before it goes to print, judge the "controversial questions," said Passent. Most journalists are not members of the Polish Communist Party, although the managing editor usually is and his appointment has to be approved by political authorities, he said.

"Censors are very often smarter than the journalists themselves; they are normal people. There are ex-censors in the press and ex-journalists in the censors' office. Censorship is official and open, the censors' office is even in the telephone directory," Passent pointed out.

Passent claimed there is no punishment for a journalist whose articles are confiscated, and having them confiscated is not considered dangerous to one's career. It is, however, Passent said, frustrating to have the article removed, and one does not get paid for confiscated material.

"In Poland there is no division between editorial writing and news writing — we do not believe that there is such a thing as 'absolute objectivity'...I would not attach any significance to the American tradition of separating news and editorials," continued Passent.

Passent said Church-State relations in Poland are viewed by the censor as being very sensitive, as well as some areas of foreign policy, such as Poland's relations with other socialist countries. But he said an accurate picture of the economic situation appears in the news reports.

"The Polish press goes through periods of tough and then light censorship...I really don't know whether censorship is really that important. It is more important for foreigners. Everything is relative...and there are quite a few underground publications in Poland," stated Passent.

Often the regular journalists write for the underground publications as well, revealed Passent, although he said the underground media only has a small readership, almost entirely composed of intellectuals.

Most letters in the regular press, according to Passent, are openly critical of the government, as a clear distinction has to be made between the Polish Communist Party, who censor, and the day-to-day administration.

"Perhaps the biggest argument last year started when four factory managers wrote a letter to Polityka demanding that the government introduce unemployment. They claimed that productivity and quality were low and that discipline was bad because the government guarantees full employment," explained Passent.

Polityka came out against the introduction of unemployment, although the majority of readers' letters were at first in favor of its establishment. Finally, Passent said, old people, who could remember what it was like to be unemployed, wrote to the paper, and the argument was evenly balanced amongst readers although the government and Polityka opposed the introduction.

"Because everything, except for the Catholic papers, is state-owned, our press is completely independent from market forces. There are no advertisements, and an issue costs a lot less than a pack of cigarettes...Some newspapers are very profitable, and some run at a great loss, but as the government pays, it doesn't matter to the journalists who work on them," said Passent.

Passent said that women are increasingly employed as Polish journalists, although the ratio has yet to reach the proportions of the medical and teaching professions where nearly every doctor and teacher now is a woman.

"Polish newspapers are very open to outside contributors if they have something important to say," concluded Passent. "In Polityka around half of the articles are written by non-staff members, although censorship does apply to everyone...but that is what history has given Poland."

Women's Caucus gains strength behind Student Senate scene

By SHERI SIMONTON
Collegian Staff

The Women's Caucus of the Undergraduate Student Senate, newly resurrected after a faltering start last semester, is designed to provide a forum for the 32 women senators, said Chairperson Julie Robertson.

The caucus strives to help the women acquire the necessary information and solidarity of position needed to make qualified decisions and judgments on issues within the senate, Robertson said.

Women hold 32 senate seats out of the total body of 110 senators. According to several senators interviewed the Women's Caucus still remains virtually "invisible" in the Student Senate. One woman senator, summarizing the situation, said "We tend to be very silent and aren't comfortable speaking during meetings."

Jill Tregor, senator and member of the Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy (SCERA), said the Caucus, despite its apparent lack of audible participation at meetings, is becoming an increasingly strong entity, involved in many senate activities and committess.

This view was echoed by Joel Weissman, former student coordinator and current co-director of communications for the Student Sentate. Weissman said the SCERA Women's Issues Team is a dominant influence in strengthening women's issues and creating awareness of them in the senate and community.

The team conducted a lighting survey of the campus in June 1979, and directed the "Women Unite, Take Back the Night" program protesting violence against women last spring. It is currently advocating the creation of a greivance procedure to combat sexual harassment at UMass.

Many women senators interviewed said that sexism and racism exist in the senate.

Three women currently hold leadership positions in the Student Senate and SCERA. Ann Bolger and linda Geary were appointed to the positions of Student Senate attorney general and co-director of communications respectively. Mary Henderson is the elected student coordinator of SCERA.

Geary said she felt many students fail to realize the significant power and rights that they, as students, should possess. She said the Senate provides a vital place to make and initiate changes..."changes more important than personal vendettas and gains."

Many of the women senators interviewed said they were disillusioned and frustrated by the extent to which "dirty politics" permeates the senate and by the senators inability to listen to each other and work as a collective unit.

They emphasized the need for unification of the splintered factions within the Senate in order to efficiently address the needs of all segments of the UMass population.

Students run Belchertown project

By MICHAEL SUSSMAN
Collegian Staff

For the last nine years, the Belchertown Boltwood Project has been looking for volunteers to spend one evening a week with clients at the Belchertown State School in one of several student-sponsored and supervised programs.

The Belchertown State School for mentally retarded individuals is located in Belchertown, about 10 miles from the UMass campus.

This semester, the eight student supervisors are offereing programs ranging from "Arts and Crafts" to "Discovering Community Resources." Volunteers spend three hours either at the school or in the community with small groups enjoying plays, learning to cook, or participating other activities.

According to Judy Rex, a Boltwood supervisor, the purpose of the projects is twofold. "They help the volunteers get an awareness of what people with developmental disabilities are like. After awhile you get to see that they are like other people," Rex said.

But, Rex added, "Clients get individual attention. That's really important here because the staff just can't always provide that.

"Those who get out into the community get the most out of the project," Rex said. "They tend to have more fun. Sometimes just getting out of the buildings is what they need."

Belchertown State School, founded in 1922, is currently being phased out by the state in favor of smaller group homes, and in-community living situations. The process is called communitization.

According to Dr. William E. Jones, in a memo dated March 31, 1978, "The Region I/Belchertown State School goal for every mentally retarded citizen, regardless of disability or current place of residence is community living."

Rex said the Boltwood Project is part of the communitization program. "Most of the clients in community trip projects are getting ready to leave the State School. Other programs are constructed to teach socialization skills," she said.

Rex said students at any of the five area colleges are eligible as volunteers. No special skills are needed. At UMass, volunteers can get one credit for a full semester of participation, although volunteers are needed now, according to Rex. Transportation is provided.

Supervisors in the program are all students at the Five Colleges. This year, three are from UMass, one from Amherst College, two from Mt. Holyoke, and two from Hampshire College. Supervisors must apply for the job through the project and spend a summer working at the school. Then, during the school year, each supervisor develops two projects.

The director of the program, the coordinator and the supervisors are all paid by the state. Program funding comes from UMass, however, and is used for transportation and supply costs.

According to Director Jerry Morissey, the project originated in the Boltwood House at Amherst College in 1970. Amherst College students organized then to volunteer at the State School. The project soon spread to the five colleges and eventually UMass became the home of the Project, since, according to Morrissey, it had the needed resources.

Women's group educates public about violent images

By MARCIA MURPHY
Collegian Staff

"There is a definite connection between violent images of women in the media and incidents of sexual assault," last week said Donna Meeks, educator advocate of Women Against Violence Against Women (WAVAW).

"Violence against women is confused with sexuality in the media when the two really have nothing to do with one another," Meeks said.

WAVAW, which originated in Northampton in fall 1978, now has an "unoffical chapter at UMass. Twelve volunteer educator advocates work with the UMass WAVAW, which is located in Everywomen's Center in Wilder Hall.

"Our purpose is to make the general public aware of the connections between violence that actually occurs and portrayals of violence in the media," Meeks said.

"We would like to see violence against women in the media eliminated. I'm angry and upset that violence against women is used to sell things — it's a way of marketing goods in our economy. I'd like to see women not used as a means to an end to sell products," she said.

People see violence against women as "sexy, and not hurting to women" when it is really "brutal," Meeks said.

Slides depicting violence against women in the media have recently been shown on campus by WAVAW in classes and dormitories. "We plan to expand the slide show for broader themes — such as local incidents of violence — in the future," she said.

WAVAW does accept donations for the slide shows, but will not refuse a showing to anyone, she said.

"Statistics are starting to back up the conclusion of a connection between violent images of women in the media and incidents of sexual assualt. It just seems to me that seeing these images provides incitement to committing an act of violence," Meeks said.

More awareness about rape could help to protect women against violence according to Meeks. "Self defense is helpful in that it provides someone with a stronger sense of self," Meeks said.

Women should be encouraged to tell police if they have been raped and to file an anonymous report to help them find the rapist.

"It is well known that many rapists commit rape more than once," she said, adding that women shouldbe aware rape can happen in almost any situation.

"Rapists aren't necessarily men in woods who jump out at you. Many women know the men who rape them. There are just no classical rapists," Meeks said.

According to Meeks talking about rape helps the victim as well as her peers. Counseling in Everywomen's Center is available 24 hours a day for rape and violence victims.

Working moms teall pros, cons

By KATE BUSCH
Collegian Staff

According to recent reports, ten years from now two out of every three mothers in this country will be working away from home, and eleven million women will enter the US work force by 1990, most of them mothers. Currently 40 percent of all married women with youn children hold down jobs outside the home, reports also indicate. The following Collegian interviews are an attempt to gain insight into some local families in which both parents work.

Professor Barbara Turner of the UMass Human Development Department has two children: Adam, 9 and Shomari, 5. "I have always worked," Turner said. "I received my Ph.D. before we had the children. That way, we had more money to spend on child care." Her work and her mother hood complement each other, she said. "We arranged to have Shomari born in the summer, so that I didn't have to stop working. I nursed the first child for 13 months and the second for 18 months. for 18 months."

Turner's husband, UMass psychology Professor Castellano Turner, said he thinks having two working parents makes children more independent. "When life demands you be independent, you have no choice," he said. The Turners said they are "very into being parents."

"I believe that it is very important to schedule times with your children, so they can depend upon having you to themselves. Unscheduled times are nice too!" he said.

He also said it is difficult to escape stereotypes in culture. "Barbara does most of the cooking. I do some cooking. Each's capacity to take the other person's usual role doesn't undo the fact that there is a distribution of labor which is a throwback to tradition," he said.

Sara Nelson, 20, formerly of Madison, Wisconsin, danced with theWisconsin Ballet Company, and is a former dance teacher. Two weeks after giving birth to a son, Jesse, she began taking another dance class. During that time, she said, her mother took care of the baby. "But I also made arrangements with a friend because I wanted my mother to be free to say 'no,'" Nelson said.

When she and her husband Jeff moved to South Hadley, they enrolled Jesse in North Village Day Care, and Sara took a jazz dance class at UMass. "I was going to take another class, but I wanted to spend more time with Jesse," she said. I also couldn't devote the amount of practice time necessary to really improve."

She began working as a waitress at the Pewter Pot in Hadley at the beginning of the summer. When North Village Day Care shrank to part-time, Sara though she would have to quit her job. Through a local flyer, she found a babysitter who could care for Jesse in her own home. "He loves it. It's like having another family," she said.

Because her husband, Jeff, a sales consultant, is on the road a lot, Sara said she does most of the housework. "Jeff doesn't know how to do 'heavy cleaning.' He does the dishes, though," she said.
said.

"Some people say that a working mother gives more quality time to her kids. I think that statement is both misleading and unfair to mothers who stay home. Quality time doesn't happen automatically. You have to work at it," Sara said. My family is the most important thing, then my job.

Another working mother is Lorraine Steinhauer, an executive secretary from South Somerville, N.J. "I had worked before my pregnancy and began working again when the children were six, eight and 10 years old. "I went to work because my income became necessary. At first I worked part-time. I was very friendly with a neighbor who looked after the kids," she said.

After working outside the home for a while, Steinhauer said she realized how much she enjoyed it. "Up until the time I started working, I had been surrounded by my family. Here I was, enjoying something that did not involve my family," she said. Because of these feeling, she said, she tried to do most of the house work herself. "I didn't want to burden the kids with housework."

Her husband Alfred Steinhauer, said he feels he is caught in the middle. He said that the family unit is very important to him.
